An express exception is sometimes made in the statutes in favor of ferryboats and tugs,[38] and many regulatory statutes profess by their terms to apply only to vessels engaged in the carriage of passengers,[39] as common carriers.[40] Statutes of this type have been held to apply to a vessel which actually carries passengers for hire, although it does not regularly engage in that business.[41] Certain gratuitous carriages of persons, other than the officers or crew of a vessel, for noncommercial purposes, have been held not to bring a vessel within the scope of acts regulating the carriage of passengers.[42] However, the transportation of persons who pay only the actual expenses incurred may be regarded as a carriage of passengers,[43] and the conclusion that a person, other than a regular member of the crew, is not a passenger, is not rendered necessary by the fact that he signs a paper which purports to make him a member of the crew at a set price but which he does not receive and for which he renders no services.[44]

f. Miscellaneous matters

a. Number of Passengers

The number of passengers which can be safely carried may be regulated by statute.

Under some statutes the number of passengers of each class which can be safely carried with prudence and safety by passenger vessels, other than ferryboats, is prescribed, and is to be stated in the certificate of inspection, and penalties are fixed for taking on board a greater number of passengers than are thus allowed.[45] Under such a statute, a penalty will not be inflicted for carrying an unlawful number of passengers where the excess of passengers over the number permitted by the certificate is composed of persons who have forced their way on the vessel against the wishes of the owners or officers of the vessel.[46]

The operators of an amusement park at a privately-owned lake, who operate an amphibious motor vehicle known as a "duck" as a diversion for their patrons, are not common carriers within the meaning of statute requiring a certificate of public convenience for its operation, where the "duck," in making a round trip of approximately two miles, partly on land and partly on the waters of the lake, from a point within the park, makes no stops for the purpose of picking up or discharging passengers and renders no intermediate service.—Commonwealth v. Excursion permits Where a passenger steamer is to engage in excursions, some statutes allow the inspectors to issue to such steamer a special written permit stating the additional number of passengers that may be carried, and also to limit the route and distance of the excursion.[47] In such a case an oral permission to carry additional passengers is insufficient as the statute requires the permit to be in writing.[48] A statute of this type does not require a special excursion permit, where a passenger steamer does not carry or purpose to carry a number of passengers in excess of those allowed by its regular certificate, and the route selected is within the one that the steamer is already permitted to navigate.[49] It has also been held that a boat usually engaged as a ferry, but which frequently forsakes its ferry route and undertakes employment as an excursion boat, need not obtain a special excursion permit,[50] and that, if it does obtain such a permit, it cannot be penalized for carrying more passengers than the number specified.[51]

b. Carriage of Emigrant or Steerage Passengers

Special statutes relating to the carriage of emigrant and steerage passengers may regulate the number of passengers to be carried, food or provisions to be furnished, and accommodations to be provided.

Under special statutes relating to the carriage of emigrant or steerage passengers, congress has, among other matters, made subject to regulation the number of passengers to be carried,[52] the food or provisions to be furnished,[53] and accommodations to be provided.[54] When such regulations are applicable, the responsibilities and duties thus imposed cannot be evaded by contract of charter.[55] Although the general terms of such an act are broad enough for all its provisions to be applicable to steam vessels engaged in the carriage of steerage passengers, only certain provisions of the notice specified have been held to apply to such vessels, where one section of the act specifically declares that steam vessels shall be subject to the provisions of the act relating to the space in vessels appropriated to the use of passengers.[56] Such regulations may be made applicable to any vessel which takes on steerage passengers in a foreign port for transportation to any port in the United States,[57] but an exception where the port of loading is in foreign territory contiguous to the United States extends to any port within such territory and is not limited to ports along the waters separating that territory from the United States.[58]

c. Dangerous Articles

The carriage of dangerous articles on passenger vessels may be subject to statutory regulation.

Under statutory regulations, the carriage of dangerous articles, such as explosives and highly inflammable substances, on passenger vessels, may be prohibited or controlled.[59] A regulation permitting the carriage of such gasoline as is used by automobiles as a source of motive power, provided any fire in the vehicle is extinguished before it enters the vessel and is not relighted until after it has left it, is violated, if an ordinary automobile propelled by gas is run on and off the vessel under its own motive power.[60] A statutory exception permitting the carriage of petroleum of a certain class, where there is no other practicable mode of transportation, does not apply where there is an all-rail route over which the oil may be carried with any profit;[61] but, if the rate of freight by rail is so high as to prevent any profit on the sale of the oil, or to destroy the trade between the points in question, it is not a practicable mode of transportation between those points.[62]

d. Equipment

The equipment to be carried and maintained by passenger vessels is sometimes made the subject of statutory regulation.

Under some regulatory acts the life-saving appliances and other equipment to be carried and maintained by passenger vessels is prescribed and some group of officials is given the power to make rules with respect to the matters provided for.[63] If the rules of such officials are declared to have, when properly promulgated and approved, the force and effect of law, and these rules are complied with, there can be no violation of the statutory regulations relating to the same matter;[64] while a violation of such rules may constitute a fraud on the government and be punishable as such.[65] Although a statute may place the primary duty as to the selection and maintenance of the prescribed life preservers, and other safety appliances, on the owner of the vessel, it is, nevertheless, the duty of the master to use ordinary observation and inquiry; and, if he thereby acquires notice of some defect in the vessel's appliances, it is his duty to take some steps toward remedying the situation.[66] A statute requiring that a certain type of life preservers be furnished is as much violated by a furnishing of improper life preservers as by a failure to furnish any at all.[67]

Radio and wireless. A statute, making it an offense for a master or other person in charge of an ocean going steamer carrying passengers to leave, or attempt to leave, any port of the United States on a voyage of over a certain distance without being equipped with prescribed wireless apparatus, may be violated by the making of such a trip by a steamer which carries besides its regular crew only persons who have signed a paper which purports to make them members of the crew at a specified sum per month but which they do not receive and for which they render no services, even though they pay no fare beyond a certain sum which they give to a ship officer to enable him to furnish them with extra food and provisions which they desire to have on the voyage.[68]

e. Inspection

Carriers of passengers by water are subject to regulation by statutes providing for inspection of vessels.

Statutes imposing a penalty for navigating a vessel without having it inspected are strictly construed,[69] and, if the object and scope of an inspection act are to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers, it will repeal, as inconsistent, a provision in an earlier act which imposes a penalty on merchandise vessels that navigate without inspection, and which provision is omitted from the latter act.[70] An inspection statute applicable by its terms only to passenger steamers applies to vessels which at any particular time carry passengers for hire as well as those whose regular business is to carry passengers.[71] A statute, prescribing that the inspectors shall, at least once in every year on application in writing of the master or owner, carefully inspect the hull, accommodations, and equipment of every passenger steamer, is construed not to leave it optional with the shipowner whether or not he shall have his vessel inspected;[72] but rather it is regarded as creating a duty on the part of the shipowner to make a written application for an inspection at least once in every year.[73] Under a statute providing for the inspection of the boiler in every steam vessel before it is used, it is as much the duty of the owner of a passenger ship to cause an inspection of a boiler that has been repaired in a substantial part, as it is to cause the inspection of a new boiler before using it.[74] After a vessel has passed inspection on the basis of its equipment being in the condition required by statute, it is the duty of the vessel to see that the equipment is maintained in the condition required.[75]

f. Miscellaneous Matters

Particular matters, which may be subjects of regulation in connection with the carriage of passengers by water, include the sale of tickets, the crew, a ship physician or surgeon, steam pressure, and other matters.

In addition to those matters considered supra subdivisions a–e of this section, various other particular matters are subject to regulation, such as the time for making claims for personal injuries.[76]

76. Statute not retroactive
Statute relating to time for making claims for personal injuries against a steamship company as a carrier was not applicable to an accident that occurred a month or more before the enactment of such statute. —Baron v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, C.C.A.N.Y., 108 F.2d 21.

Under some statutes[77] designed to protect uneducated or foreign persons, such as steerage or emigrant passengers,[78] the sale of steamship tickets is regulated.

Copies of synopsis of laws. Under a law requiring the secretary of the treasury to prepare a synopsis of the laws relating to the carriage of passengers and requiring the owners of vessels to keep two copies of the synopsis posted in conspicuous places on the vessel, it is no defense that one copy had been posted,[79] or that the surveyor of the port where the vessel was registered had been unable to furnish the owner two copies.[80]

Crew. Where a statute requires a passenger steamer to have on board and in its service such complement of licensed officers and crew as may be entered by the local inspectors in the certificate of inspection, the sufficiency of the crew depends on the terms and construction of the inspection certificate.[81] A statute repairing a full crew, and sufficient at all times to manage the vessel, is violated where the crew taken on board is of such a race that they cannot understand orders that are given them because of lack of knowledge of the language in which they are given.[82]

Physicians and surgeons. A federal statute, found in an act regulating the carriage of emigrant or steerage passengers, and requiring that ships carrying more than fifty steerage passengers carry a duly qualified and competent surgeon or medical practitioner, permits his services to be required only by steerage or emigrant passengers,[83] and not by cabin passengers or members of the crew.[84]

Rates, classification, etc. Under the federal Constitution and statutes applicable to the territory of Hawaii, the territory is authorized to investigate and regulate the rates, classifications, acts, omissions, and practices of a Hawaiian steamship corporation engaged in the business of carrying passengers in territorial waters[85]

Steam pressure. Under a statute making it the duty of the master to see that the safety valve on the boiler is raised when the vessel comes to a stop, so as to relieve the steam pressure, the master cannot leave it to the discretion of the engineer whether or not the safety valve will be opened at stops,[86] and the statute is violated if the valve is not raised even though other means, such as opening the furnace door, are sought to be used to reduce the pressure[87]

§ 180. —— Penalties, Forfeitures, and Liabilities for Violation

a. In general
b. Liens
c. Remission
d. Actions and proceedings to collect

a. In General

Statutes regulating the carriage of passengers by water usually provide for the imposition of penalties for a violation of their provisions. A statute which, in addition to a penalty, imposes a special liability if damage results from the neglect of specified persons does not limit the common-law liability of the shipowner as a carrier of passengers.

Under regulatory acts providing for special penalties for the violation of particular provisions, and providing in a general section for the payment of a certain sum where any vessel is navigated without complying with any of the terms of the act, it has been held that the fact that the provision violated is one for which a special penalty is provided does not prevent the imposition of the general penalty,[88] although there is also authority to the contrary.[89] The fact that a general penalty is to be imposed only when a vessel has been "navigated" without complying with the provisions of the act has been held not to restrict its imposition to situations only where regulations dealing with technical matters of navigation are violated[90] A penalty of this nature may be imposed for failure to do anything required or provided for in the regulatory act,[91] such as, noncompliance with a provision limiting the number of passengers which may be carried.[92]

Regulatory acts which, in addition to penalties and forfeitures, provide that whenever damage is caused to a passenger or his baggage, the master and owner, or either, and the vessel shall be liable for the full amount of damage if it happens through failure to comply with any of the regulatory provisions, and that if the loss occurs through neglect on the part of the mate, engineer, or pilot, they may be sued for the damages sustained, do not limit the common-law liability of a shipowner as a carrier of passengers by confining his liability to cases where he is himself at fault,[93] but the liability may be imposed where the injury is caused by the failure of those employed on the vessel to comply with the regulatory provisions.[94] The liability arising under such a statute is not affected by other statutes providing for a limitation of liability for merchandise on behalf of shipowners, but the unlimited statutory liability arises only where the property injured is such as may be said properly to constitute "baggage" of a passenger.[95] If the owner of a passenger vessel fails to have his boiler inspected as required by statute, and it subsequently explodes to the injury of passengers, liability arises, under a statute of the nature above described, even though it is not shown that the failure to inspect was the cause of the explosion,[96] or that an inspection would have necessarily disclosed the imperfections and weakness which resulted in the accident.[97]

b. Liens

In the absence of express statutory provision, no lien exists against the vessel for penalties and fines incurred because of violation of statutory regulations.

In the absence of express provision, no lien exists against a vessel to secure the payment of penalties and fines incurred by its officers or owner because of violation of statutory regulation;[98] and a provision that the vessel engaged in violation of a regulation shall be liable for the penalties prescribed, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel, does not create a lien,[99] but merely gives a right to enforce the penalty by a proceeding in rem.[1] A statute providing that the amount "of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions" of a regulatory act shall be liens on the vessel violating such provisions creates a lien on the vessel for a sum which a preceding section provides the master shall "be fined" and imprisoned in event of violation.[2] The rule is the same even though the extent of the lien cannot be determined until after the conviction of the master, and the assessment of the amount of the fine imposed on him,[3] although in this situation the only penalty recoverable against the vessel is that which has been adjudged against the master in the criminal prosecution.[4] A statutory lien, to secure the payment of penalties, is not divested by a sale of the vessel to a bona fide purchaser,[5] but if the right in rem, which is given, is only one to proceed by way of libel, and not a lien, a sale of the vessel before the filing of a libel will defeat any remedy against it.[6]

c. Remission

Fines and penalties incurred because of violation of statutory regulations may be remitted under appropriate statutory provisions.

Congress may validly grant to the secretary of the treasury the power to remit fines and penalties incurred by the violation of federal regulations relating to the carriage of passengers;[7] and where the power granted is to remit "any fine or penalty" provided for in a regulatory act, and the rights granted informers are made subject to the power of remission except where the claims of the informer have been adjudicated prior to the application for remission, a warrant of remission operates to discharge all liability for penalties given in favor of individuals and for which a suit in rem has been brought but not yet tried.[8] The power of the secretary of the treasury to remit fines and penalties may be limited to those provided for in an act relating to the supervision and inspection of steam vessels,[9] and may not extend to penalties provided for in an act regulating the carriage of steerage and emigrant passengers;[10] and a statute transferring to the secretary of commerce the power conferred on the secretary of the treasury, as to the remission of fines and penalties, does not give to the secretary of commerce any greater power than that previously possessed by the secretary of the treasury.[11] In the absence of express authority, an executive officer, charged with the duty of prosecuting for penalties incurred under the provisions of a regulatory act, has no power to grant a remission or mitigation of such penalties;[12] but where it is within his supervisory authority to determine as a preliminary matter whether the penalties of an act have been incurred, he may, after an investigation of the evidence, determine the amount of penalties, if any, for which prosecution will be taken.[13]

d. Actions and Proceedings to Collect

(1) Determination by executive department

(2) Judicial actions and proceedings

(1) Determination by Executive Department

An executive department, vested with power and duty to prosecute for violation of statutory regulations relating to carriage of passengers, has no jurisdiction to determine judicially the existence of a liability for penalties.

A statute vesting a certain executive department or official with the power and duty to prosecute for violations of regulations relating to the carriage of passengers confers no jurisdiction on the executive to determine judicially the existence of a liability for penalties.[14] Such a department may, however, in consideration of its delay in taking court proceedings to enforce a penalty which is a lien on the vessel, and in order that the vessel may obtain immediate clearance, take a bond conditioned to pay such penalties as the department shall, after an investigation of the facts, determine to have been incurred.[15] This bond will be valid as a common-law obligation even though the department has no statutory authority to require bonds;[16] and the case being properly submitted by the condition in the bond, the department may proceed to determine the penalties incurred.[17] In an action on the bond, the court will not revise the proceedings before the department,[18] but will only decide whether the facts have been submitted to the department and what determination has been made by the department on such facts.[19]

(2) Judicial Actions and Proceedings

In the absence of a prescribed remedy for the recovery of a penalty for violation of statutory regulations relating to the carriage of passengers, a common-law action of debt is appropriate.

When no remedy has been prescribed for the recovery of a penalty imposed on the master or owner personally, a common-law action of debt is an appropriate remedy;[20] and this remedy is exclusive if the statute creating the penalty gives only this remedy for its enforcement,[21] but there exists authority to the effect that a libel in personam may be maintained in an admiralty court for the recovery of a penalty.[22] Where the statute makes a violation a misdemeanor on the part of the master, and subjects him to a fine and imprisonment, a civil proceeding in admiralty cannot be maintained against him for the recovery of the fine.[23] If a federal statute, providing for full liability for injuries to person or property resulting from a failure to comply with regulatory provisions, prescribes no remedy for the enforcement of the liability, it may be enforced in the state courts by a common-law action.[24]

In the absence of a lien or express authority, a proceeding in rem cannot be maintained for the recovery of a penalty,[25] but where a penalty has been made a lien on the vessel,[26] or where no personal liability for the penalty is prescribed but the vessel itself is made subject to forfeiture,[27] a libel in rem in admiralty may be brought to secure the enforcement of the penalty; and an error of the clerk in docketing the case on the civil docket as if it were a common-law action will not prevent the court from proceeding with the case as an admiralty suit in rem.[28] When by one section of a regulatory act the master of the vessel is made guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine for the doing of a certain act, and by another section the fine thus imposed is made a lien on the vessel, it is usually held that no libel can be maintained against the vessel until after the master has been criminally prosecuted and convicted,[29] although there is also some authority to the contrary.[30] If the penalty, made a lien, is one which may be recovered in an action of debt by any person suing for it, and the conduct which causes it to be incurred is not made a misdemeanor, the proceedings in rem may be brought direct without a previous action in personam.[31] An attachment or seizure of the vessel, before the filing of the libel, has been held unnecessary, where the penalty and the lien may be enforced by a private individual,[32] and other cases have held that the execution and delivery of a statutory bond to secure the release of a vessel operates as a waiver of any objection that the vessel was not seized until after the filing of the libel.[33]

Election of remedies. In situations where a penalty may be recovered either by an action in personam or a proceeding in rem, a pursuit of one remedy does not necessarily amount to an abandonment of the other,[34] and although a personal judgment has been obtained, if the penalties have not been paid, a lien still exists against the vessel, and this may be enforced by a proceeding in rem.[35]

Jurisdiction Where a penalty is made a lien on the vessel, jurisdiction for a proceeding in rem for its recovery does not depend on the place where the offense was committed,[36] but any court, within whose territorial jurisdiction the vessel may be at the time of the commencement of the suit, has jurisdiction of the cause, and the vessel may be seized by the marshal of that court.[37] If not expressly or impliedly prohibited, an action to enforce a statutory liability imposed by federal statute for failure to comply with federal regulatory provisions may be brought in a state court[38]

Parties, pleading, and evidence. If by statute the right to recover a penalty is given to any person suing for it, the United States is not a necessary party to an action brought for its recovery,[39] nor need the suit be prosecuted in its name, since such a statute implies the right of a private party who proceeds to enforce the penalty to sue therefor in his own name.[40] A statute providing that every pilot, engineer, mate, or master of any vessel who refuses to observe certain regulations shall be liable to a penalty of a certain sum, and for all damages sustained by any passenger, does not authorize recovery by one not a passenger,[41] or the imposition of a penalty against an owner.[42]

A libel for the recovery of penalties may set forth the offense in the language of the statute which creates it, if there is designated with sufficient certainty the time and place of its commission;[43] but the libel must set forth the grounds on which the penalty is demanded.[44] A pleading based on an offense of carrying passengers without complying with certain statutory provisions may use the word "passengers" in the same manner as the statute, without specifying that the persons were carried for hire, even though a person must be carried for hire in order to be a passenger.[45] In a proceeding in rem to recover a penalty, prescribed for carrying an excess number of passengers, which is made recoverable by any person suing for it, the libel need not allege that the libelant was a passenger,[46] or that he was an informer, or that he sued as such;[47] nor need it set out the names of the passengers taken on board[48] A libel is defective if it fails to disclose the statute relied on,[49] but this is a defect which may be cured by amendment.[50]

General rules of evidence govern with respect to the burden of proof,[51] presumptions,[52] the admissibility,[53] and weight and sufficiency[54] of evidence in actions brought to recover penalties incurred by a violation of the regulations as to the carriage of passengers.

Judgment, costs, and review. As in other cases, the amount of the judgment is measured by the allegations of the pleadings.[55] A judgment rendered in a personal action, against the owners of a vessel for penalties incurred by the carriage of an illegal number of passengers, is not conclusive as against the vendees of the vessel in a subsequent suit in rem to enforce payment of the penalties,[56] and they may show in the suit in rem that the number of passengers illegally carried was less than found by the jury in the first action.[57]

Where there is apparently good ground for a suit against a vessel to recover penalties, the case is a proper one for judicial investigation and costs will not be awarded to the respondents,[58] notwithstanding the suit is required to be dismissed,[59] particularly where the respondents have not explicitly set forth the real grounds of defense in their answer,[60] thus lengthening the time required for the investigation.[61]

In proceedings for the forfeiture of a vessel for violation of a regulatory statute, new grounds for forfeiture, or charges not made in the lower court, cannot be urged on appeal.[62]

§ 181. —— Offenses

a. In general
b. Prosecution

a. In General

Under statute certain action or conduct on the part of specified members of a vessel's personnel, resulting in the destruction of life, may constitute a criminal offense. Intent or malice is not an essential element of such offense.

In order better to secure the lives of passengers carried on navigable waters, congress may, within its constitutional powers, enact a statute making guilty of a criminal offense every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on any steamboat or vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duties on such vessel, the life of any person is destroyed, and every owner, inspector, or other public officer, through whose fraud, connivance, misconduct, or violation of law, the life of any person is destroyed.[63] It may and must be shown that accused is a person within the terms of the statute in order to constitute this offense,[64] and he must have been guilty of some act or conduct condemned by the statute,[65] and such default must have resulted in the destruction of human life.[66] Intent or malice is not an essential element of the offense.[67] The application of such a statute is not limited to situations where the vessel involved is propelled by steam,[68] but it applies in the case of any vessel on the navigable waters of the United States,[69] including sailing yachts.[70]

Under a statute, so providing, it is an offense for one, without consent of the owner of a vessel, to secrete himself thereon with intent to obtain transportation without paying therefor.[71]

b. Prosecution

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the federal courts have jurisdiction of offenses created by the federal statutes relating to the carriage of passengers by water.

When not prohibited by express provision,[72] the federal courts have jurisdiction of offenses created by the federal statutes relating to the carriage of passengers by water,[73] even though such offenses take place on navigable waters within the territorial jurisdiction of a state.[74] As between federal courts, if the offense is committed within United States territory, jurisdiction of the offense is in the federal court within whose territorial jurisdiction the destruction of life takes place.[75] Where the act which results in death is felonious and willful so as to constitute the crime of manslaughter under the laws of a state, and is committed on navigable waters within the territorial jurisdiction of a state, a state court may take jurisdiction of the offense under its laws, although the same act may be an offense under the federal statute, if congress has not manifested its intention to exclude the exercise of such jurisdiction.[76]

Defenses. In a prosecution of the captain of a vessel for manslaughter because of the loss of life due to his failure to attend to his duties in properly providing the vessel with safety appliances and fire fighting apparatus, it is no defense that the government inspectors have failed in their duties, and have issued a certificate of inspection, when the appliances of the vessel were in such a condition that it should not have been allowed to navigate.[77]

Indictment. It is not necessary for the indictment to show that the offense charged was committed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or on the high seas, and outside of the jurisdiction of any state;[78] nor need it be expressly alleged that the offense was committed on navigable waters of the United States if it is shown that the vessel was on a specific water, which is in fact navigable, and the court judicially notices that fact.[79] Accused need not be expressly charged with having committed the crime of manslaughter.[80] It has been held that the indictment in stating the offense must do more than follow the words of the statute,[81] and that it should describe the facts relied on to show "misconduct," "negligence," or "inattention to his duties," on the part of accused,[82] but there is also authority to the contrary.[83] It has been held that the indictment may join, as defendants, several officers or employees on a vessel, without showing that their acts were jointly destructive of the lives of those on board or were joint in their commission.[84]

Evidence. General rules as to evidence in criminal prosecutions apply in prosecutions by the United States for offenses involving the death of passengers,[85] and for the offense of secreting one's self on a vessel, without consent of the owner, with intent to obtain transportation without paying for it.[86]

Trial General rules as to trial in criminal prosecutions apply in prosecutions by the United States for offenses involving the death of passengers.[87] Questions of fact are for the jury.[88] Instructions should correctly state the law in conformity with the issues and evidence.[89]

money paid for a voyage or passage.[90] The term "freight" may include a passenger's fare,[91] but not when the meaning of the word is otherwise determined by the context.[92] "Passage money" is defined as the fare of a passenger by sea; money paid for the transportation of persons in a ship or vessel.[93]

Under a contract to transport to the port of destination, the shipowner is ordinarily not entitled to passage money until he has fully completed performance of the contract by landing the passenger at the port of destination,[94] even though the voyage is prevented by inevitable accident[95] or the acts of the government at the port of embarkation.[96] Where, however, the contract is not to transport to the port of destination, but simply to permit a person to come on board and remain there as a passenger, during the voyage, the passage money may be earned although the passenger is not taken to the port of destination because of shipwreck.[97] Unless it is specially agreed on, a partial completion of the voyage does not entitle the shipowner to a pro rata payment of passage money;[98] and unpaid passage money cannot be recovered if passengers without their consent are carried past the port of destination and landed at another.[99]

Special contracts as to baggage will be considered infra § 196 a. Recovery of passage money paid in advance is discussed infra § 202.

Liability for the payment of fare or passage money. A person who has been invited by a part owner of a vessel to take free passage thereon as a guest may not be held responsible for passage money by the other owners of the vessel,[1] but the inviting owner will be responsible to the others for such profits of theirs as he has appropriated.[2]

(3) Sale by agents and brokers
(4) Tickets and contracts for carriage over connecting lines
(5) Conditions in tickets and limitations on use

(7) What law governs

(1) In General

The obligations incurred by a contract for the carriage of passengers depend on the terms of the offer and acceptance. Tickets which on their face purport to be a contract and prescribe the rights and obligations of the parties in detail are regarded as contracts.

In general the obligations incurred by a contract for the carriage of passengers depend on the terms of the offer and the acceptance.[3] A passage ticket which does not purport on its face to be a contract, and which is drawn in the nature of a receipt, is regarded as a mere token to enable the bearer to be recognized as a person entitled to be received on board the vessel;[4] but steamship tickets for ocean voyages which bear as a heading the words "Passenger's Contract Ticket," or their equivalent, and which purport to prescribe the rights and obligations of the parties in detail, are generally regarded as contracts which govern the rights of the parties,[5] and not as mere tokens.[6] It is not necessary in order to have the ticket constitute a contract that there be a showing of some additional consideration other than the passage authorized by the ticket and the amount paid therefor.[7] Although the ticket reads in the terms of a receipt reciting the receipt of so much money for passage on a particular vessel, at a certain time, and from one named port to another, it nevertheless imports a contract to supply those things for which it is recited the money has been paid.[8]

Contract of affreightment. A contract for the carriage of passengers by water has been said to be a contract of affreightment,[9] in the same manner as contracts of affreightment for the carriage of goods, considered supra §§ 108, 110. So, in analogy to the rule denying a lien on the vessel to the owner of cargo until it is laden on board or delivered to the master, as considered supra § 110, prospective passengers, who have purchased tickets for transportation but have not boarded the vessel are not entitled to a lien on the vessel for the breach of an executory contract of passage.[10] Likewise, in such a case a lien cannot be imposed on the vessel on the theory that it can be made liable in tort for the breach of a duty as a common carrier to fulfill a contractual duty to transport passengers,[11] or by the fact that passenger monies are used to secure supplies for the vessel and to pay the wages of the crew,[12] since it is the owner of the vessel, and not the vessel, as an entity, who is the common carrier.[13]

Construction. Passage contracts drawn by the carrier are construed most strongly against it.[14] In interpreting any one provision of the contract between the carrier and the passenger all other provisions of the contract must be considered.[15]

Failure or refusal to surrender ticket or pay fare. Where a passenger knows that he is to give up his ticket before leaving the vessel, if he does not give it up or pay his fare the owners of the vessel have a right to detain him for a reasonable time to investigate on the spot the circumstances of his case.[16]

(2) Purchase by Third Person for Passenger

Where one purchases and pays for a ticket to be used by another, it has been held that the carrier cannot inquire into the consideration and arrangements between the purchaser and passenger for whose benefit the contract is made.

Where one person purchases and pays for a ticket to be used by another, it has been held that the carrier cannot inquire into the consideration and arrangements between the purchaser and the passenger for whose benefit the contract is made,[17] and assert that as to the passenger the contract is nudum pactum.[18] If, in the purchase of a ticket by one person for another, a special agreement to make a stateroom reservation is entered into, the special arrangement is a part of the contract of carriage and inures to the benefit of the person for whom the ticket is purchased.[19]

Purchase in this country for emigrant abroad. If the papers, given to a friend or relative who purchases in this country passage for an emigrant abroad, provide only for a general right of passage and for repayment of the passage money if the emigrant fails to come, the emigrant on receiving such original papers may in the country of his residence surrender them for a contract ticket of a more definite nature which will determine the rights as between him and the carrier.[20] Where a steamship company undertakes in this country to sell tickets for passage from other countries, by forwarding such tickets to its agents at the port of embarkation, and fails to forward a ticket, purchased by a person in this country, to a passenger at a foreign port of embarkation, the passenger may recover in tort for the steamship company's breach of contract in negligently failing to forward the ticket.[21]

(3) Sale by Agents and Brokers

Representations or promises by a duly authorized agent in connection with the sale of a ticket for carriage of a passenger by water are usually binding on the owners of the vessel.

the ship,[22] or on a railway company where its agent in connection with a contract for transportation by land enters into a contract for carriage on a connecting carrier by water,[23] unless there is in the contract an express provision exempting the carrier from responsibility for the statements of employees not in accordance with the terms of the contract.[24] Representations as to the route that will be followed, made by persons who are in fact selling tickets but are not the authorized agents of the vessel owner, form no part of the contract of carriage and do not bind the carrier.[25]

Responsibility of ticket agent or broker. A ticket agent or broker, who is not an agent for any steamship line, merely undertakes to apply for the passage sought,[26] and binds himself only for the genuineness of the tickets that he undertakes to sell [27] He does not undertake to transport the ticket buyer[28] or contract that the carrier will do so,[29] and is not liable to the ticket purchaser where there is no breach of the undertaking to apply for passage [30] Where the agreement between the ticket purchaser and agent is modified or replaced by a new agreement under which reservations are booked for another mode of transportation and such reservations are subsequently canceled by such purchaser, the agent is not liable for breach of contract.[31]

(4) Tickets and Contracts for Carriage over Connecting Lines

An owner of one of several steamship lines for the transportation of passengers, running in connection over several portions of a route, may contract as principal for the carriage of passengers over the whole route.

An owner of one of several steamship lines for the transportation of passengers, running in connection over different portions of a route of travel, may contract as principal for the conveyance of the passenger over the whole route,[32] and such a contract may be established by the circumstances notwithstanding the fact that the passenger receives separate tickets for the different lines or vessels, which are signed by their separate agents.[33] A steamship company, which sells a round trip ticket for a voyage which includes side trips in automobiles owned by another company, which are arranged for and advertised as a part of the trip and paid for by the purchase price of the steamship ticket, may assume responsibility for the passenger's carriage on the side trips;[34] but no such responsibility will be imposed where the ticket contains an express provision that the selling company acts only as agent and accepts no responsibility beyond its own line.[35]

(5) Conditions in Tickets and Limitations on Use

Conditions and limitations in contracts for the carriage of passengers may be valid, and when placed in the body of the passage contract become binding on the passenger on his acceptance of the ticket with time to examine its contents.

Conditions and limitations in contracts for the carriage of passengers by water have been held valid,[36] and when placed in the body of a passage contract for an ocean voyage, so as to be a part thereof, they become binding on the passnger by his mere acceptance of the ticket within such a time as to give him an ample opportunity to examine its contents.[37] It is not necessary that the passenger have actual knowledge of such conditions or limitations[38] or that his attention be called to them.[39] The failure[40] or inability[41] of the passenger to read his ticket does not preclude his being bound by such conditions and limitations, provided they are not unlawful in content.[42] Conditions printed on the back of a passenger's contract ticket will bind a passenger in the same manner as those appearing on the face, if, on the face of the ticket and as a part of the contract, it is stated that the ticket is issued subject to the conditions printed on the back thereof,[43] or if sufficient reference to such conditions is made on the face of the ticket.[44] In the absence of a reference in the passage contract sufficient to incorporate as a part thereof conditions appearing on the back,[45] stipulations or conditions so printed form no part of the contract and do not bind the passenger unless his attention has been called to them or it is shown that he knew or had reason to know of their existence.[46] The binding effect of a provision, printed on the front of a ticket, imposing a limitation on the value of luggage is not, however, affected by the fact that a choice of rates available to the passenger for different valuations is printed on the back of the ticket[47] or the fact that such matter is not specifically called to his attention.[48] Although there is authority to the contrary,[49] a mere notice on the front of the ticket is not usually regarded as part of the contract,[50] and is not to be

"Notice" on margin

binding on the passenger in the absence of its having been read by him, or called to his attention.[51]

Incorporation by reference to tariff schedules. A provision in a contract ticket that it is sold subject to the conditions of the lawfully published tariff of the steamship company incorporates as a part of the contract and makes binding on the passenger such conditions as are properly contained in a tariff schedule, published and filed, in compliance with statutory requirements.[52] Conditions or limitations contained in a tariff schedule cannot have this effect if they have not been adopted as a part of the contract of carriage,[53] if they have no relation to matters which may properly be inserted in the tariff,[54] or if the tariff has not been filed as required by law even though it has been published.[55]

Notice of intention to sail. A steamship company may properly require by condition in the ticket that before a passenger shall be entitled to passage he must give notice of his intention to embark a specified number of days in advance,[56] but noncompliance with a condition requiring notice of intention to sail to be given so many days in advance in order to obtain the reservation of a berth does not excuse the vessel owner from liability for failure to forward a ticket purchased in this country for a passenger abroad.[57]

Alterations in ticket. A provision in a ticket that the agent issuing it shall have no power to alter any of its provisions and that any alterations so made shall not be binding on the carrier is one that is designated for the benefit of the carrier, and the fact that an agent alters the port of destination as printed in the ticket cannot be relied on by the passenger to show that the contract, after it has been fully executed, is invalid and that limitations contained therein are not binding on the passenger.[58]

Exchange of tickets A steamship company may properly establish a rule requiring the passenger to appear at the company's office at the port of sailing within a reasonable time before departure and exchange the coupon previously received for a berth ticket.[59] If such a rule has not been complied with, even though it has not properly been brought to the attention of the passenger, an officer of the ship who refuses passage because of the lack of a berth reservation commits no wrong where by statute a ship is prohibited from carrying passengers for whom there are not berths[60] If such a rule is not printed in the literature or tickets handed to passengers, a steamship company will be held responsible for the consequences of the negligent conduct of its selling agents in informing passengers that the coupon first received entitles them to passage without further formalities.[61]

Redemption of unused ticket. In the absence of an express stipulation requiring the surrender or return of the unused ticket as a condition precedent to its redemption, it has been held that, under an agreement to redeem, the return of the ticket is not a condition precedent to recovery of the price paid,[62] but under an express provision requiring such surrender it is essential to a recovery.[63]

Where purchaser of steamship tickets, unable to use them, took matter up with the shipping company's chief clerk, who said he was manager, and promised to return money, although tickets were not produced, it was held that such purchaser, could not recover, where he failed to surrender the tickets, in view of express stipulation of contract that no one but general passenger agent had authority to modify contract, which expressly provided that ticket should be surrendered.—Kirschner v Netherlands-American Steam Nav. Co., supra.

Unless there is something in the contract to prohibit it, a passenger's rights under a ticket may be assigned or transferred to another,[64] and this may be done by delivery of the ticket for a valuable consideration without a written transfer.[65]

(7) What Law Governs

The nature, obligations, and construction of a contract for the conveyance of passengers by water are generally determined by the law of the place where the contract is made; the law of the place where the contract is to be performed governs as to performance of the contract.

The nature, obligations, and construction of a contract for the conveyance of passengers by water are, as a general rule, to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made,[66] not that of the place where the performance of the contract is to be completed[67] or that of the shipowner's domicile.[68] The terms of a contract, which provides that it is to be construed under the laws of a specified place, are not to be construed as including penal provisions of the laws of such place.[69] Stipulations for exemption from liability, although valid by the law of a foreign country, which the contract states by its terms is to govern, are not enforceable in our courts if contrary to the public policy of this country, either where both vessel owner and passenger are citizens of the United States and the place of completion of the contract of carriage is within this country,[70] or where the contract is made in this country between a foreign steamship company and a passenger who is to be carried to a foreign port,[71] but apparently the rule is otherwise where a contract for carriage to this country is made in a foreign country between a foreign steamship company and passenger.[72]

Matters relating to the performance of a contract for carriage by water are governed by the law of the place where the contract is to be performed.[73]

§ 183. Performance of Contract or Duty to Transport

It is the primary duty of the owner of a vessel to see that a passenger is carried to, and safely landed at, the port of destination.

It is, in general, the primary duty of the vessel owner to see that a passenger is carried to, and safely landed at, the port of destination.[74] Nonperformance of a contract to transport may be excused by impossibility of performance due to conditions arising from a state of war,[75] particularly where the terms of the contract for passage make conditions arising from a state of war an excuse for nonperformance.[76] Under a clause excusing

Refunds; recovery of deposits

(1) As far as provisions for refund of money paid for passage from a foreign country to the United States are to be performed in such foreign country, its law governs.—Translateur v. U. S. (2) Under contract entitling one to refund in such foreign country or elsewhere, depending on where the demand therefor is made, where demand is made in New York, its law, as the place of performance, rather than that of the foreign country governs.—Kassel v. N. V. Nederlandsch Amerikaansche Stoomvaart Maatschappij, 24 N.Y.S.2d 450, 177 Misc. 92, appeal denied 35 N.Y.S.2d 730, 264 App.Div. 859.

(3) Where performance of contract to transport to the United States was prevented by our laws, the law of place of performance had no application in action to recover money deposited with steamship company in a foreign country for transportation and expenses.—Baer v. nonperformance of a contract to transport when prevented by "restraint of princes," the action of a foreign government in removing a passenger from a vessel when it calls at a port on the way to his port of destination in another country, has been held to excuse nonperformance.[77]

Passport. In the absence of a contractual undertaking to do so, a carrier by water is not obligated to procure a passport for a passenger[78] and the fact that the carrier inspects a passenger's passport does not imply a contract to pass on the validity of such passport.[79]

Undesirable and too many passengers A vessel whose custom it is to carry steerage passengers commits no breach of contract or duty as to a first-class cabin passenger by the mere taking on of steerage passengers at a port where a contagious disease has broken out[80] Although the rule appears to be otherwise where the overcrowding is due to an extraordinary condition, such as an earthquake, and the excess number of passengers come on board against the wishes of the owners and officers of the vessel,[81] passengers are ordinarily entitled to demand that no more shall be carried than the vessel can reasonably accommodate,[82] and voluntary overcrowding of the vessel so as to result in insufficient and inadequate accommodations is a violation of the carrier's duty to carry safely and with proper accommodations,[83] even though after the voyage is under way the carrier does all that is within its power to furnish proper accommodations,[84] but a passenger who seeks passage after the vessel is already overcrowded, and is informed that because of that fact he cannot be given the usual accommodations, takes the risks of the inadequacy of the accommodations which are offered him and which he accepts[85] The fact that a vessel has obtained permission from inspectors to overcrowd the vessel, beyond the limits of its accommodations, has been held not to relieve the vessel owner from liability for damages resulting to passengers from an overcrowding of the vessel.[86]

§ 184. —— Commencement of Voyage; Vessel to Be Furnished

A contract calling for carriage on a particular vessel is not satisfied by an offer to furnish passage on another vessel. Contracts for carriage of passengers have been held to include a warranty of seaworthiness.

Under a contract for carriage by a particular vessel, it has been held that where it is wrecked and destroyed prior to the commencement of the voyage the carrier, in order to be entitled to any of the passage money received, must at least furnish another vessel equally as safe and with equal accommodations;[87] but it has also been held that a contract calling for carriage on a particular vessel is not satisfied by an offer to furnish passage on another vessel, although it is competent and safe.[88] On a failure to furnish the specific vessel within the time allotted by the contract the passenger is entitled to rescind and abandon the voyage,[89] but if, instead of rescinding, the passenger accepts transportation on another vessel, which the steamship company has arranged for, the passenger thereby ratifies the original contract and he remains bound by its terms.[90] When the vessel, on which the voyage is to be taken, is, without the knowledge of either party, completely destroyed at the time the contract of carriage is entered into, the only obligation on the part of the vessel owner, in the absence of an agreement to provide a substitute vessel, is to return the passage money with interest.[91]

Condition and seaworthiness of vessel. Although there is much to indicate that a contract for the carriage of passengers does not include an absolute implied warranty of the seaworthiness,[92] as is involved in an undertaking for the carriage of goods, considered supra § 140, it has been held that every contract for the transportation of passengers by sea contains an implied warranty on the part of the owner that the vessel is seaworthy, or that she will be made seaworthy before the voyage is proceeded on.[93] It is, at least, clear that liability will result from a failure to exercise due care to make the vessel seaworthy, as discussed infra § 193; and although passengers have purchased their tickets, and paid their passage money, they may nevertheless rescind their contracts and refuse to go to sea for the reason that they believe the vessel to be unseaworthy, unless on a survey the vessel is found to be staunch and properly equipped for the contemplated voyage.[94] The vessel must be provided with a crew adequate in number and competent to perform all their duties with reference to all the exigencies of the intended route.[95]

Time for, and delay in, commencement of voyage The commencement of the voyage, at the time provided for, is not excused by reason of the fact that the stress of weather has disabled the vessel from reaching the port of departure at the time provided for embarkment,[96] although it has been said that if the commencement of the voyage is delayed because the weather is so stormy as to make it unsafe to go to sea, there is no violation of the contract as to the time for commencement of the voyage.[97] Where the only time specified in the ticket is that the passage will take place within a particular month, the owner of the vessel has the whole of that month within which to furnish transportation to passengers,[98] but if passage on the vessel agreed on is not furnished within the month, passengers are not deprived of their cause of action for breach of contract because of the fact that before the month expires they cease to wait for the vessel and leave the port of embarkation by other modes of transportation.[99] Where, however, the passenger, before the lapse of the time allowed for the commencement of the voyage, determines not to go on the voyage, relying on his right to a return of the passage money, it has been held that he can recover only one half of such money[1] notwithstanding the vessel does not actually sail until after the time agreed on.[2]

Departure ahead of time. Ordinarily, a departure of the vessel before the time agreed on, resulting in the passenger's being left behind, constitutes a breach of contract for which damages may be recovered,[3] but a departure of a vessel before the time agreed gives no right of action to the holder of a ticket who is left behind where, before the time scheduled for sailing, the government inspector has forbidden the taking of any more passengers on the boat.[4]

Departure with visitors on board Friends and relatives who go aboard to assist passengers or bid them farewell are entitled to reasonable means and opportunity of leaving the boat before she starts,[5] and there is no presumption of law, that every person who goes on board does so as a passenger unless he notifies an officer to the contrary, which will relieve the carrier from its duties in this respect.[6] A person who has brought a passenger aboard to escort him to his cabin and pay his fare, and who has been assured by the clerk that he will have time to pay the passage money, is entitled to sufficient time to transact his business before the usual signals are given and the vessel started.[7]

§ 185. —— Ejection of Passengers

Ordinarily one accepted as a passenger aboard a vessel, after payment of fare, cannot, while behaving properly, be ejected before the contract of carriage has been performed.

As a general rule, a person who has come on board a vessel engaged as a common carrier of passengers in violation of no rules, has been accepted as a passenger, has paid his fare, and is behaving properly in all respects, cannot be rightfully expelled from the vessel before the contract of carriage has been performed.[8] The fact that such a passenger is threatened with almost certain death at the port of destination affords the master no justification, even though he acts with humane motives, in expelling the passenger and putting him on board another vessel which returns him to the port of departure.[9] Although a passenger has been guilty of misconduct on a former occasion, if he has come on board, has paid his fare, and is conducting himself in a decent and orderly manner, the carrier cannot deny him passage.[10] However, if a person who is so ill that he is not fit to travel without medical attention purchases an ordinary ticket from a steamship company without giving notice of his condition, depending wholly on the carrier to furnish medical aid, the carrier on discovering that fact, after the passenger has boarded the vessel, may remove him to the shore and refuse passage.[11] After a person who was a passenger has ceased to become such, by reason of his remaining on board the vessel an unreasonable time after its arrival, becoming in effect a trespasser, he may properly be ejected provided that no more force than is reasonably necessary is used to accomplish the ejection.[12] The carrier may eject from its vessel a passenger who persists in carrying on a business thereon in violation of the carrier's rules.[13]

Threat to eject; command to leave. A threat by a ship's officer to eject a passenger unless the passage money is paid, because of erroneous information that a check with which the passenger paid for his ticket is worthless, constitutes a breach of duty on the part of the carrier and gives rise to a cause of action for damages, even though the passenger is not actually ejected due to the fact that the fare is paid by a fellow passenger.[14] The leaving of a boat in compliance with an officer's command to that effect is equivalent to an ejection, and is not a voluntary departure from the boat.[15]

a. In General

A contract for the carriage of passengers usually implies a right to reasonably suitable comforts, accommodations, and conveniences.

Unless there is an understanding to the contrary,[16] a contract for the carriage of passengers carries with it by implication a right to reasonably suitable comforts, accommodations, and conveniences.[17] In order to be reasonable and proper, the accommodations must be such as are usually afforded to passengers of a similar class,[18] on similar voyages,[19] and in similar vessels;[20] but as the passenger's contract also entitles him to such accommodations as are necessary to a reasonable degree of comfort, and to physical health and safety,[21] it is no justification that other vessels in the trade carry passengers in such numbers as to be inconsistent with their comfort or their health.[22]

Refusal to furnish. Refusal to recognize a passenger's rights to the class of accommodations to which his ticket entitles him gives rise to a cause of action in his favor,[23] and a person entitled to first-class accommodations does not forfeit his right to recover for refusal to supply proper accommodations by declining to accept an offer of first-class accommodations conditioned on a payment of the passage money a second time.[24] If a passenger, on coming aboard, is wrongfully refused the class of accommodations to which he is entitled, because of his race or color, and is told either to ac-

Command of police officer

Under statute requiring that aid be given a public police officer on his lawful command, a purser who acts under the direct command of a police officer, and not as an officer of the boat, in ejecting one who has ceased to be a passenger and has become a trespasser does not, thereby, render the owner of the vessel liable.—Duval v. Inland Nav. Co., 155 P. 768, 90 Wash. 149.

Assault or excessive force

The purser of a steamboat who willfully or wantonly assaulted a trespasser on the boat, who had become such by failing to leave within a reasonable time after landing, or who used more force in accomplishing the ejection than was reasonably necessary, was liable to such trespasser.—Duval v. cept steerage passage or get off, the passenger need not leave the vessel in order to preserve a right of action,[25] but he may remain and insist on the accommodations to which he is entitled,[26] and having been informed that his rights will not be honored, he may, on being ordered to go into steerage quarters, refuse to surrender his ticket without forfeiting his right to recover for any injuries that may be sustained by reason of the breach of contract.[27]

Special reservations for officers. The officers of a vessel have a right to reserve a table for themselves in the dining saloon and may properly exclude a first-class passenger therefrom without regard to the necessity of their making such a reservation.[28]

Exchange of accommodations. A passenger who has contracted for accommodations of a certain type or class cannot, after he has come on board and found them somewhat unsuitable for his purposes, demand that they be exchanged for accommodations of a better class on payment of only the difference in price between the two classes of accommodation.[29]

Continuance and termination of duty to furnish A contract that a passenger will be supplied with good and sufficient food and lodging to the port of destination, and that such arrangement is to hold good in event of unavoidable accident or delay, places a duty on the carrier to see that sufficient food and suitable lodging are furnished during the time that a passenger is taken off and detained at a government quarantine station outside the port of destination,[30] and the carrier is not relieved from liability for neglect to furnish accommodations during such period by reason of a provision that it will not be liable for delay from "restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples."[31] After the arrival in the port of destination, the duty to furnish accommodations to passengers comes to an end.[32] Although passengers who have taken ill during the voyage are taken to a hospital to be cared for, the carrier is under no duty to pay for such expense;[33] and at the end of the voyage the vessel need not restrain and care for a sick person who has taken passage simply because his health will be endangered by leaving the vessel.[34]

b. Quarters

(1) Berths and staterooms
(2) Lower class and steerage quarters

(1) Berths and Staterooms

Berth and stateroom accommodations must be sold, until exhausted, without discrimination to applicants in the order in which they make their applications.

Berth and stateroom accommodations must be sold without discrimination to applicants in the order in which they are applied for until they are exhausted,[35] and if a passenger is refused a berth while others making later applications are supplied with them, the carrier may be held responsible.[36] On steamers running at night, a berth is a reasonable and proper accommodation,[37] and a carrier is liable for failure to furnish it, unless the fact that none can be had is made known to a passenger who chooses to ask for a berth when he buys his ticket.[38] The purchase of a first-class passage, which includes all night travel by vessel, carries with it the right to stateroom accommodations, where by custom and usage the passenger contracts for such accommodations when securing first-class passage.[39] Furthermore, if the comfortable and desirable staterooms are all disposed of, passengers who are paying the highest rate of fare must be informed of the nature of accommodations that can be afforded them, and be allowed to determine whether they will take the risk of such accommodations.[40] Where an express contract to furnish stateroom accommodations has been entered into, the failure to furnish such accommodations is a breach, irrespective of whether or not it was practicable to travel without such accommodations.[41] The exclusion of a passenger from a cabin or stateroom, for which he has contracted, renders the carrier liable even though the passenger is informed, on coming aboard, that his cabin is unavailable and either to forego the voyage or do without such accommodations.[42] A passenger holding a ticket entitling him to a berth has no right to demand, without extra charge, an entire stateroom for himself;[43] but one who has contracted for the use of a cabin or stateroom has a right to have it sufficiently free from cargo that he can get into it,[44] or to have it in such a condition that it is a healthy and comfortable place in which to live;[45] and a woman first-class passenger does not receive the accommodations to which she is entitled if the stateroom is occupied by a boy of such an age that she cannot consistently with ordinary decency use the stateroom as a place to disrobe and sleep.[46]

(2) Lower Class and Steerage Quarters

Steerage or other lower class passengers, quartered as a group, are entitled to demand that proper measures be taken to keep their quarters reasonably clean and comfortable.

Steerage or other lower class passengers who are given certain quarters as a group are entitled to demand that all proper measures be taken to keep their quarters reasonably clean and comfortable.[47] Reasonable facilities for washing, and the like, must be afforded,[48] and female passengers of such groups have a right to require that bunks or berths be not assigned to them promiscuously, without adequate arrangements to secure privacy.[49] Lower class passengers are ordinarily entitled to the use of their quarters free from the inconvenience and risk of having freight,[50] or the baggage of first-class passengers[51] stored therein; but the mere fact that three or four dogs are kept in a steerage cabin has been held not to constitute such breach of steerage passengers' contract for passage as to entitle them to substantial damages.[52] In order to diminish the risk from freight piled in the room, the carrier cannot require that steerage passengers obey an arbitrary regulation requiring them to remain in their berths during the whole of the voyage or an unusual portion of it.[53] Unless there is a fair understanding to the contrary, an undertaking to carry a steerage passenger for a long voyage includes an obligation to furnish the passenger with a berth,[54] but when not contracted for, there is no duty to furnish such passengers with bedding or covers[55]

c. Provisions

In the absence of a special contract to the contrary, a common carrier by water must provide passengers with an adequate supply of wholesome food, and with water fit to drink, and such provisions must be sufficient to meet contigencies of an accident to the vessel.

In the absence of a special contract to the contrary, it is the duty of a common carrier by water to provide its passengers with an adequate supply of wholesome food,[56] and with water fit to drink and uncontaminated,[57] and such provisions must be sufficient to meet the contingencies of an accident to the vessel and the resulting delay in voyage, from whatever cause such accident and delay might arise.[58] If the food is sufficient in quantity, properly cooked, such as is usually furnished on the kind of voyage involved, and the passenger sustains no real suffering, he cannot complain because it is not as good as it might have been.[59]

d. Medical Service

There is no common-law duty to carry a physician or surgeon to provide medical service for passengers.

There is no common-law duty to carry a physician or surgeon for the treatment of passengers,[60] and, in the absence of some special agreement, if a person who is ill, without disclosing that fact, chooses to come on a vessel as a passenger, there is no duty to offer the sick passenger special care or medical treatment;[61] but as to a passenger who is injured during the voyage, there is a duty to see that his injuries receive such care as is reasonably practicable in view of the facilities available.[62]

§ 187. —— Interruptions and Abandonment of Voyage

Interruption or stoppage of the voyage because of unavoidable wreck or destruction of the vessel does not excuse nonperformance of the contract for carriage; but the owner of the vessel may be entitled to have the passengers wait a reasonable time for repairs or the providing of another mode of transportation

Unless the contract is otherwise than to transport to the port of destination,[63] an interruption or stoppage of the voyage at an intermediate point, because of unavoidable wreck or destruction of the vessel, does not excuse nonperformance of the contract, at least to the extent that the shipowner is not entitled to passage money, unless he pays or tenders to the passenger the expenses or means of proceeding to the port of destination.[64] If a voyage is interrupted by shipwreck or other unavoidable disaster to the vessel, the vessel owner is entitled to have the passengers wait a reasonable time until repairs can be made or another mode of transportation obtained;[65] and if the passengers by their own act deprive the captain of an election to repair and continue the voyage,[66] or fail to avail themselves of the opportunity to proceed on the voyage by other means provided,[67] the owner is entitled to retain any passage money paid; but if a voyage is interrupted or broken up in consequence of an original unseaworthiness of the vessel, the passenger need not wait for repairs to be made, or until another vessel is hired, but he may treat the contract as breached and rescind immediately.[68] If without destruction or injury of the vessel completion of the voyage becomes impossible because of some cause beyond the carrier's control, but which he should have anticipated, it is the duty of the vessel to retrace its course or to afford the passenger a free return to the port of departure.[69] To leave the passenger at another or intermediate port, under such circumstances, constitutes a breach of contract which will render the vessel owner liable for any damages which proximately result.[70] There is an entire failure to perform the contract of carriage if due to bad management a vessel having arrived at an intermediate port abandons the voyage and returns its passengers to the port of departure.[71]

§ 188. —— Transportation by Connecting Lines or Vessels

The owner of the initial line, contracting as a principal for the carriage of a passenger over connecting lines or vessels running in connection over different portions of the entire route, has the primary duty of seeing that the passenger is carried to the final port of destination.

Where different lines of vessels run in connection over different portions of an entire route of travel, and the owner of the initial line has contracted as principal for the conveyance of a passenger over the entire route, it becomes the primary duty of such carrier to see that the passenger is carried to the final port of destination.[72] The loss or destruction, by act of God, of the vessel of the connecting line which is to carry the passenger from one of the intermediate ports does not absolve the owner of the vessel making the initial carriage from all duty under his contract.[73] In such a situation the passenger cannot, without further concern, be left at the intermediate port, but it becomes the duty of the owner to offer substantially to perform his contract, if by the exercise of reasonable diligence he can procure another vessel to take the passenger on to his port of destination;[74] and a failure to supply another vessel when it can be had renders the owner liable for breach of contract;[75] but if the destroyed connecting vessel is replaced as soon as possible, by another equally seaworthy, the passengers have no cause of action for the delay in making the connection.[76] However, if it has been contracted that the passengers shall incur no extra expenses and that they shall be allowed on board the connecting vessel immediately, a refusal to allow the passengers on board the substitute vessel, after it arrives in port will render the carrier responsible for expenses incurred by the passengers while remaining on shore.[77]

§ 189. —— Deviation

The owner of a vessel, in the absence of express contract, is not obligated to carry a passenger directly or by a particular route to the port of destination.

Unless the vessel owner has expressly contracted to do so, he is under no obligation to carry a passenger directly or by a particular route to the port of destination,[78] but where the contract provides for direct transportation from one port to another, or carriage by a particular route, a deviation therefrom constitutes a material breach of contract, rendering the owner liable, in any event, for a return of the passage money,[79] and for damage or injuries which proximately result from the breach.[80] However, liability for deviations cannot be imposed without regard to conditions and limitations contained in the contract of carriage on the ground that by a deviation the express contract is abrogated and the carrier becomes responsible as an insurer for the due performance of his duty to transport.[81]

§ 190. —— Going Ashore at Intermediate Ports

Under a special contract providing for the passenger going ashore at intermediate ports, a refusal to let him go ashore may constitute a breach of contract; passengers do not forfeit all their rights as passengers by going ashore at an intermediate port at which the vessel happens to stop.

Under a special contract for an excursion cruise, a refusal to let a passenger go ashore at a port at which it has been agreed a sight-seeing trip is to be given, may constitute a breach of contract on the part of the company that has contracted to furnish the passenger with the cruise.[82] Passengers who have purchased only a through passage from one port to another do not forfeit all their rights as passengers by going ashore at an intermediate port at which the vessel happens to stop,[83] and if passengers on being allowed to go ashore are informed by officers of the vessel that she will not sail until a specified time, they may hold the vessel responsible for damages if they are left behind by reason of the captain's changing his plans and sailing ahead of time without taking reasonable steps to give notice to the passengers ashore.[84]

§ 191. —— Stops and Landing at Port of Destination

The landing of a passenger is an essential part of the contract to transport, and the carrier is obligated to land the passenger at his port of destination.

The landing of a passenger is an essential part of the contract of transportation,[85] and it has been said that the carrier cannot, by stipulations to the effect that the landing shall not be a part of the voyage, exempt itself from liability for providing improper landing facilities to passengers.[86] At any rate, although it may be expressly agreed that a landing to passengers is not guaranteed and that they are to procure their own means of getting themselves and their stores ashore, the vessel remains under an obligation to wait at the port of destination a reasonable time to enable the passengers to procure boats to make their landing, unless an excuse is offered by an intervening act of God.[87] Where there are no intervening circumstances to afford an excuse, the carrier cannot, without breach of contract, carry its passengers past the port of destination agreed on and land them at another.[88] If the stress of the weather is such as to make it dangerous to do so, a carrier by water may be justifed in failing to land at one of its regular stops,[89] but in such a case the carrier comes under a duty to inform passengers headed for that port that the vessel will not stop there,[90] and if on the making of another landing a passenger is deceived into debarking by representations that it is his port of destination, the carrier will be responsible for any injuries proximately resulting from its breach of duty.[91]

§ 192. Personal Safety and Liability for Injuries

An injury to a passenger on board a passenger ship, happening in consequence of negligence on the part of the owner, officers, or mariners of the vessel, is both a breach of the contract for transportation and a tort, entitling the injured person to compensation and to a lien therefor on the vessel. As a general rule, anyone, whether a corporation or individual, who has assumed the obligation of carrying the passenger safely to the port of destination is liable for injuries resulting from a breach of the contract of carriage.

An injury to a passenger on board a passenger ship, happening in consequence of negligence on the part of the owner, officers, or mariners of the vessel, is both a breach of the contract for transportation and a tort, entitling the injured person to compensation and to a lien therefor on the vessel.[92] Under a state statute making vessels navigating within the state liable for injuries inflicted on passengers by employees of the vessel, it has been held that, where the injury is inflicted within the state, the vessel is liable to the same extent as is the employee inflicting the injury;[93] but, where the wrongful act takes place outside the state, the passenger must show that the employee was acting within the scope of his employment when the act was committed.[94]

Companies or persons. As a general rule, anyone, whether corporation or individual, who has assumed the obligation of carrying the passenger safely to the port of destination is liable for injuries resulting from a breach of the contract of carriage.[95] Although a person may not own a vessel if it is in fact navigated by or for him, he may be held responsible for the acts of the employees, although he has no control over their hiring and discharge.[96] A part owner of a vessel, who benefits by its navigation, may be jointly or severally liable for the negligent acts of the employees of the vessel, even though he exercises no active control over its management.[97] In order that an owner may be liable it is not necessary that he should have had the vessel registered in his name.[98] However, the lessor of a steamboat, not being a quasi public corporation and having received no special privileges or benefits from the state, is not liable for injury to a passenger caused by the negligence of the lessee.[99]

A steamship company which has contracted as principal to furnish a passenger with a side trip in the auto of another company is liable for injuries sustained by a passenger because of the negligence of the servants of the latter company during side trip;[1] but where, on the face of a coupon ticket, entitling a passenger to a transfer between stations by a taxicab company, it is stated that the steamship company in selling it acts only as agent and does not accept responsibility beyond its own line, the selling company is not liable for injuries caused by the negligence of the taxi driver.[2]

The general agent of a vessel, who is neither the owner pro hac vice, nor a common carrier operating the vessel, nor the employer of the master or crew, is not liable for the tortious or negligent acts of members of the crew,[3] and, as a mere arranger of transportation under his duty to arrange for the transportation of passengers, such an agent does not incur the liability of a common carrier.[4]

Master of vessel. Not only is the master of a vessel personally liable for injuries resulting from his own misconduct,[5] but he is also responsible for injuries inflicted on passengers by the negligence of subordinate employees who are under his command.[6]

Law governing liability. It is the general maritime law, as understood and administered in the courts of this country in which the litigation is prosecuted, that governs in an action brought in an admiralty court of the United States to recover for injuries sustained by an American passenger on a foreign ship on the high seas.[7]

Defenses in general. According to some authorities the fact that a passenger is engaged in traveling in violation of a statute that prohibits travel on Sunday, at the time the injuries are sustained, is no defense to an action to recover for such injuries.[8] If a passenger is injured by a quarrelsome and fighting crew it is no defense to the carrier to show that such a class of men is usually employed on steamboats.[9] When the negligence of the vessel carrying a passenger has proximately resulted in a collision causing injury, it is no defense that negligence of the other vessel also contributed to the collision,[10] but, where the other vessel brings a limited liability proceeding in which the passenger is cited, and in such proceedings it is adjudged that the collision was due solely to the negligence of the petitioning vessel, such judgment is conclusive on the passenger and is a defense to a subsequent suit by him against the vessel on which he was being carried.[11] If a passenger is injured while coming on board, and because of that refuses to pay fare which the captain thereupon agrees not to charge, this does not operate as a settlement or release of the passenger's cause of action, for the injuries sustained, unless it is expressly shown that there was such an intention or understanding on his part.[12]

13. High degree of care
It is frequently stated that a carrier by water is bound to exercise a high degree of care for the safety of its passengers.
U.S.—Voltmann v. United Fruit Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 147 F.2d 514—Kvart v. Swedish American Line, C.C.A.N.Y., 126 F.2d 279—Moore v. American Scantic Line, C.C.A.N.Y., 121 F.2d 767—Bellocchio v. Mich., 79 F.Supp. 802, affirmed, C

as a general rule that a vessel engaged as a common carrier of passengers must exercise as high a degree of care in taking a passenger on board, carrying him to the port of destination, and landing him safely as the means employed and the circumstances of the case will permit,[14] and, should the passenger, without negligence on his part, be injured by the failure of the carrier or its servants to exercise the degree of care required, damages may be recovered.[15]

Private carrier compared. Although a private carrier of passengers by water is under a duty to exercise a high degree of care,[16] a higher degree of care is imposed on a common carrier of passengers by water than may be imposed on a private carrier.[17]

Vessel not an insurer. A vessel carrying passengers is not absolutely liable for, or an insurer of, the safety of its passengers as a carrier of goods is for its cargo,[18] but it is responsible only for injuries which have been caused by the negligence of it or its servants,[19] and, hence, it is not liable for injuries caused by an accident which the proper degree of care, skill, and diligence could not anticipate or prevent.[20] Therefore, if without any negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees a passenger is injured because of the action of the sea or extreme weather conditions, the carrier is not liable.[21]

Passengers who do not pay fare The same degree of care must be exercised with respect to passengers being transported by small boat to the vessel for the purpose of taking passage and paying fare,[22] or passengers who have come on board with intention to take passage but have not yet paid their fare,[23] as must be exercised with regard to passengers who have paid their fare in advance. A person, being carried gratuitously under a pass or under a custom whereby masters of steamboats permit persons whose usual employment is on board such boats to be carried from place to place free of charge, is entitled at least to be protected from gross negligence on the part of the vessel's employees.[24] With respect to persons in distress who are gratuitously taken on board it has been held that the vessel is responsible only for injuries that are caused by gross neglect.[25]

Children and passengers under disability. Ordinarily, where the circumstances are such that dangers to children can more readily be anticipated, it seems that greater care may be required than with respect to adults;[26] but, where all customary and adequate precautions, as far as adult passengers are concerned, have been taken to guard against injuries from the vessel's machinery, and to provide additional safeguards would greatly interfere with operation, the vessel owner is under no duty to anticipate and prevent the possibility of accidents to infants incapable of caring for themselves and who are suffered by those in charge of them to roam about the ship.[27] Where an intoxicated passenger is taken on board, and to the knowledge of the vessel's employees he is in such a condition as to be unable to help himself, such care and assistance must be exercised for his safety as the situation reasonably requires,[28] and it is not sufficient to exercise only such care as would be required in the case of a sober passenger.[29] The intoxication of the passenger will not alone absolve the vessel from negligence,[30] as the mere fact that a passenger was intoxicated does not constitute contributory negligence, as discussed infra § 194.

Duty as to passenger overboard. After a passenger has fallen overboard, because of his own fault or otherwise, it is the duty of the master and crew to make every reasonable endeavor consistent with the safety of the ship and passengers to rescue the passenger as soon as his situation is discovered.[31] In addition, steamboats carrying passengers for hire are under a duty to be provided with such life saving appliances as are ordinarily requisite to save persons who have fallen overboard,[32] and, if because of negligence in having insufficient or defective means,[33] or in failing properly to man a boat sent to the aid of the imperiled passenger,[34] a rescue is not effected, which would otherwise have been accomplished, the vessel owner is liable for the passenger's drowning.[35]

(2) Persons Not Passengers

Persons, who are rightfully on the vessel but who are not passengers in the legal sense, have been regarded as invitees for whose safety ordinary care must be exercised.

Persons, who are rightfully on the vessel but who are not passengers in the legal sense, have been regarded as invitees for whose safety ordinary care must be exercised.[36] Thus, a person being carried by a vessel to a port where he is to perform some services for it may hold the vessel liable, at least, for injuries inflicted by cruel and improper treatment on the part of the ship's officers,[37] and employees of one vessel who are being transported on another vessel or tug, by virtue of a contract entered into by their employer, are invitees of the vessel on which they are being carried and entitled to the exercise of ordinary care and precaution for their safety.[38] Furthermore, it has been held that the vessel owner may be liable for injuries negligently inflicted on a person brought on board by employees in violation of the express command of the owner.[39]

Friends or relatives who, with the permission of or without objection on the part of the vessel owner, accompany passengers to the dock or on board the vessel are usually regarded as invitees or business visitors for whose safety ordinary care must be exercised,[40] although there is also some authority to

(3) Passengers in Forbidden Quarters

Even though a passenger, in being where he should not be, may in a sense be a trespasser, he is still a passenger, and the violation of his contract does not put an end to the duties which the carrier owes to him as such.

The presence of a passenger in a place where he should not be may not be wrongful,[42] and it has been stated that even though a passenger, in being where he should not be, may in a sense be a trespasser, he is still a passenger,[43] and the violation of his contract does not put an end to the duties which the carrier owes to him as such[44] While such a passenger is entitled to nothing that pertains to the class into which he has wrongfully intruded,[45] the duties owed to all passengers, arising out of the contract of carriage, do not disappear,[46] and the carrier must protect his safety as though he were in his proper class,[47] even though he masquerades as a passenger of another class.[48] It is, therefore, irrelevant to recovery whether the passenger had gone where he should not, provided his presence is known to the carrier and it neglects reasonably to protect him from injuries which he might suffer where he is[49] Thus, the fact that a passenger has innocently gone to a part of the vessel where he has no right to be does not cause a forfeiture of his right to be protected against the willful and wanton assaults of the vessel's servants;[50] but, where the injury has been caused by an asserted act of negligence, the fact that the passenger was in a place where he had no right to be and was not expected may be of importance in determining whether the proper degree of care was exercised for his safety.[51]

(4) Duty to Warn of Dangers

The vessel's duty to exercise care for the safety of passengers involves the duty of warning passengers of dangers which the ship's employees might reasonably anticipate and which are not readily apparent to passengers.

The vessel's duty to exercise care for the safety of passengers involves the duty of warning passengers of dangers which the ship's employees might reasonably anticipate and which are not readily apparent to passengers,[52] and the vessel will be liable for an injury that might well have been avoided had due warning been given[53] The duty to warn, however, does not extend to dangers which are as observable by, and obvious to, the passenger as to the ship's employees,[54] or to remote or possible dangers of which the passenger is aware.[55]

Sufficiency of warning. The warning should be given in such a manner as to bring home to the passengers an appreciation of the danger,[56] and, as the master is in supreme command of the vessel, he should make plain his orders for the safety of the passengers and see that they are carried out.[57]

(5) Protection against Injuries by Fellow Passengers or Other Third Persons

The vessel may be liable for injuries to a passenger by the negligence or misconduct of fellow passengers or third persons where the vessel or its employees know or might reasonably anticipate the happening of such injury, and fail or neglect to take the proper precautions to prevent it.

The vessel and its employees are under a duty to use great care to protect passengers from the negligent and reckless acts of other passengers,[59] and, where the vessel or its employees know of a threatened injury by a fellow passenger or might reasonably anticipate the happening of such injury, and fail or neglect to take the proper precautions to prevent it, the carrier is liable therefor.[60] The liability of the vessel arises not alone from the fact that the passenger has been injured, but from the failure to afford him proper protection, and, hence, unless the vessel or its employees know or ought to know that danger from fellow passengers exists or is reasonably to be apprehended, and can, by the use of proper care, prevent the injury, the carrier is not liable.[61] Thus, if the carelessness of a fellow passenger is such that no danger from it can reasonably be apprehended, the vessel owner will not be liable for failure to obviate it.[62] Furthermore, the vessel is not liable where its employees have used all available means to prevent the injury to a passenger by the tort or misconduct of a fellow passenger.[63]

Third persons. The vessel is not liable to passengers for the unforeseen negligent or illegal acts of third persons, which could not reasonably have been anticipated or guarded against,[64] but it must take care to guard against the acts of third persons, which may reasonably be anticipated,[65] and, if the vessel has itself been negligent, liability is not excused by reason of the fact that the negligence of another vessel has contributed to the injury.[66]

Arrest of passengers by officials of local ports. The duty of a vessel to protect its passengers against the unlawful acts of third persons does not require that its officers interfere with an arrest, by public officials at the port of destination, of a passenger who is suspected of having committed a crime while the vessel was on the high seas, even though such officials act mistakenly and unlawfully.[67]

(6) Negligence and Wrongs of Vessel's Employees

Although there is no liability for conduct of employees which is not negligent or wrongful, the owner, the vessel, or the master is liable for any injury suffered by a passenger because of the negligent conduct of an employee in the course of his employment, and by the great weight of authority the owner or the vessel may be liable, under some circumstances, for acts of an employee outside the scope of his employment.

the vessel,[70] or the master[71] is liable. There is some authority for the view that the vessel owner is not liable for an injury caused by a willful or malicious act of an employee, which is done outside the scope of his employment,[72] but by the great weight of authority the contract of carriage imposes on the vessel and its owner the duty to see that the passenger is given absolute protection against the acts of employees on board, and liability for an injury by the act of an employee exists irrespective of whether the act was willful or malicious, and outside the scope of the employee's employment, as long as it was done during the discharge of the duty owed by the employer to the passenger.[73] Thus, the vessel owner has been held liable for wanton assaults on passengers[74] or for their wrongful arrest and imprisonment,[75] irrespective of whether the employee is acting to benefit his employer or because of malicious motives of his own, and also for injuries resulting because of a drunken officer forcing his way into the stateroom of a female passenger at night.[76]

It is not every assault by an employee on a passenger which gives rise to a cause of action against the vessel or its owner.[77] Employees may use such force as is reasonable and necessary to compel a passenger to comply with a valid regulation, and the carrier will not be liable for injuries caused by the use of such force,[78] although it will be liable if the force used is unreasonable and unnecessary.[79] The fact that a passenger has voluntarily engaged in a prior combat with an employee affords no justification for a subsequent assault made by the employee without participation on the part of the passenger.[80]

Threats, insults, and disrespectful treatment. Among other things which the contract of carriage places on those who are bound by it is the duty to see that passengers are accorded proper and respectful treatment by the officers and servants of the vessel, and are not made the object of insulting and humiliating language or conduct by such employees.[81] It has been said that female passengers especially are entitled to complete exemption from rude, indecent, or brutal behavior toward them by employees.[82]

Aid to helpless passengers. If the negligence of a vessel's servants places a passenger in a position in which he is unable to care for himself, the vessel owner is liable if the servants do not exercise care in extending the passenger such proper assistance as is required,[83] and, although a passenger, without fault on the part of the vessel,[84] or even by his own fault,[85] has got into a helpless condition, the ship's employees in attempting to aid him must use due care to avoid injury.

Liability for acts of particular types of employees. In general the liability for acts of employees extends not only to officers of the vessel,[86] but to all members of the crew.[87] However, if an employee of a steamboat in ejecting or arresting a passenger acts under the direct command of a police officer in a jurisdiction where there is a statute making it the duty of every person to aid in an arrest after being commanded to do so, the vessel owner is not responsible for the employee's conduct in obeying such a command.[88]

gently fails to make any attempt to give an injured passenger proper treatment;[89] but it is the general rule that a physician or surgeon taken on board in compliance with a statutory command is not a servant or agent of the shipowner and the latter is not liable for the negligence of the former in treating a passenger, provided the duty of selecting a physician who is competent and duly qualified has been fulfilled.[90] The relationship of physician and patient must be created with the consent of the passenger in order that this rule may apply,[91] and a shipowner may be held responsible where a statutory physician, under orders of ship officers, compels a passenger to undergo an injurious examination against his wishes,[92] but not where a passenger by his conduct voluntarily submits to an operation.[93] It also seems to be the rule that a vessel owner is not responsible for negligent treatment by a physician or surgeon, carried as a matter of choice, provided the duty of selecting a reasonably competent man for that position has been duly fulfilled.[94] In the selection of a physician or surgeon only reasonable care and diligence need be exercised.[95] It is not necessary that he be of the highest skill and longest experience;[96] and this duty is sufficiently fulfilled when the physician's fitness is diligently inquired into and proper evidence of his qualifications is duly demanded and received.[97] The fact that the surgeon errs in his treatment does not prove that he was incompetent or that the steamship company was negligent in appointing him.[98]

Pilots. The fact that owners are bound to take a pilot, and that they are restricted in their choice to those pilots licensed by the government inspectors, does not exempt a vessel owner from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of the pilot in the navigation of the vessel.[99]

Stevedores. Although stevedores who have made a contract to load or unload a vessel are ordinarily regarded as exercising an independent employment so that the ship is not liable for their acts,[1] in handling the baggage of passengers, bringing it on board from the wharf, and placing it where the passenger desires in his compartment, stevedores are not exercising an independent employment,[2] but are performing a duty to passengers, which rests on the ship,[3] it is the duty of ship's officers to see that the task is so performed that risk of accident to persons on board is avoided,[4] and if, through want of care, stevedores are not prevented from using a companionway which is being used by passengers and their friends and injury results, the vessel is liable.[5]

Passageways, gangways, etc., intended to be used by passengers on a seagoing vessel, should be kept clear of dangerous obstructions — Aquino v. Alaska S. S. Co., 91 P.2d 1014, 199 Wash. 490.

Repairs

Shipowners are exempt from liability when they exercise due diligence in selecting trustworthy, experienced, and capable persons to make repairs —Henson v. Fidelity & Columbia Trust Co, C C A Ky, 68 F 2d 144, rehearing denied 69 F 2d 778

but the mere fact that the appliances maintained by the vessel present a measure of peril does not necessarily import negligence.[8] It has been stated that the conveniences and safeguards required depend on the size and the character of the vessel.[9] In places where the presence of passengers is contemplated, proper precautions must be taken to guard against injuries likely to result from their natural mistakes due to ignorance as to the condition or construction of the vessel,[10] and it cannot be assumed that they are as familiar with the construction of vessels as experienced seamen;[11] but there is no duty to guard against accidents which result from an unanticipated use of a particular part of the vessel;[12] and only reasonable care, prudence, and diligence need be exercised in respect of matters which are not in themselves dangerous and which passengers have an opportunity to observe.[13]

Inspection. A vessel carrying a large number of passengers in the exercise of the responsibility resting on it must make some degree of inspection to see that the various parts and appointments of the vessel remain safe and are not put out of place or rendered dangerous by such ignorant or stupid persons as commonly might be anticipated among a large number of passengers.[14]

Customary and generally approved appliances and machinery. As a common carrier, a vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers is required to use well-known and approved appliances for the safety of passengers[15] Where the machinery and appliances of a vessel are such as have been in general use and found to be safe, it is generally held that their use is not negligence such as will render the carrier reasonsible for injuries sustained by a passenger from them,[16] but the fact that a vessel or its appliances are constructed in accordance with a standard that is fairly prevalent does not necessarily exclude the existence of negligence in construction since the use of a standard clearly dangerous may constitute negligence.[17]

Machinery and mechanical apparatus Before the voyage is commenced the mechanical apparatus of the vessel, which is necessary for its operation, must be placed in good condition so that passengers will not be injured by reason of the vessel's being helplessly stalled in the open sea.[18] In order to protect passengers against injuries that are likely to be the direct result of defects in machinery all precautions against danger, which have been practically tested and are of known value, must be adopted;[19] but the machinery need not be made of the "most perfect" material or constructed in the "most perfect" manner;[20] and, where a passenger has been injured by the explosion of a boiler, the fact that skillful manufacturers of machinery used in such ships did not use certain safety appliances, which science had made known and demonstrated to be useful, is not conclusive on the question of the vessel's negligence.[21] The owners of vessels used in

Berths

(1) Vessel must comply with passenger's reasonable request for suitable device to afford convenient access to berth, and where passenger requested footstool of custodian of cabin, vessel assumed responsibility for adequacy of stool to meet stated needs —The De Grasse, D C N Y, 58 F.2d 1019.

(2) If cabin steward could not procure stool which passenger sought for climbing into berth, steward should have relayed request to superior, and if vessel's agent assumed to decide passenger did not require lower stool to climb into berth, or that article supplied was adequate, vessel was liable for natural consequences.—The De Grasse, supra.

(3) Where a ladder to an upper berth is hanging in a place which appears to be safe, the carrier owes a duty to a passenger to warn him of the danger of using the ladder in that position, and to instruct him in the proper application of the ladder.—Pacific S. S. Co. v. Holt, C.C.A. Or., 77 F 2d 192.

Doors

Steamship company's failure to equip door of ship opening on deck with automatic controls to retard its motion in closing was held negligence as to passenger injured by door slamming on his fingers —Osipuk v Oceanic Steam Nav. Co, C.C.A.N.Y., 64 F 2d 478.

carrying passengers do not undertake that the machinery they employ is absolutely free from defects;[22] and, where all proper care has been exercised, there is no liability for injuries resulting from latent or undiscoverable defects in the machinery or mechanical equipment.[23] However, where the use of apparatus is such that dangerous consequences are likely to result from a defective condition, more than ordinary care must be exercised,[24] and in such a case the fact that a defective condition is not observed or apparent does not necessarily exclude negligence where there are means available, by careful examination or practical tests, to discover the cause of the infirmity in the defective appliance.[25] With respect to machinery which is not inherently dangerous only ordinary care, in view of the dangers to be apprehended, need be exercised,[26] but if there is a failure to exercise such care, and a defect results in injury to a passenger, the vessel is liable.[27]

Guard rails and chains around deck. All portions of the deck on which passengers are permitted to go must be reasonably guarded by chains, rails, or some other means, to prevent passengers from falling or slipping overboard.[28] A statutory regulation requiring ocean-going vessels to have lifeboats so placed and fitted that they can be launched in two minutes does not absolve the owner of such a vessel from his duty to see that the space between the ends of two lifeboats is protected by reasonably safe guard chains, although the space behind the boats must be left open;[29] or, if the only kind of guard consistent with the regulation is an insecure one, there is a duty to exclude passengers from the immediate neighborhood of the lifeboats.[30] Gangway openings may be sufficiently protected by the use of customary means which experience has proved to be safe;[31] and a failure to have all the guards completely in place immediately after the vessel leaves the dock does not show negligence where the opening is sufficiently guarded for ordinary purposes but a passenger is pushed overboard because of an unanticipated event,[32] but a complete failure to have the gangway gate set, at the time the vessel leaves the dock, is negligence which will render the vessel owner liable for injuries sustained by a passenger in being pushed overboard through the opening.[33]

Safety appliances. A vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers must be supplied with reasonably adequate life-saving appliances,[34] and in order to have a sufficient exercise of reasonable care for the safety of passengers it is necessary that appliances used for extinguishing fires be kept, at all times, in a condition for immediate service.[35]

c. Boarding and Discharge of Passengers

It is the duty of a carrier of passengers to maintain at all proper times a reasonably safe means for passengers to get on and off the vessel employed, and to provide employees to render such services as are necessary to get passengers safely aboard or on shore.

It is the duty of a carrier of passengers by water to maintain, at all proper times, a reasonably safe means for passengers to get on and off the vessel employed,[36] and to provide employees to render such services as are necessary to get passengers safely aboard or on shore.[37] This duty exists with respect to passengers who have already come aboard and are returning to perform some forgotten errand, as well as those coming on for the first time or those finally departing at the port of destination.[38]

Gangplanks. Narrowness and lack of guards or rails of any kind have been regarded as rendering a gangplank insufficient,[39] although, in cases where the use of such a gangplank has involved its being placed at a considerable angle, this latter fact has also been stressed as showing its insufficiency.[40]

If, in the use of such a gangplank, a passenger falls off and is injured, the carrier is liable for the injuries sustained irrespective of the cause of the fall if a sufficient gangplank would have prevented the injury [41]

Securing gangplank or vessel. The carrier is not only liable for injuries resulting from a failure securely to fasten a gangplank in the first instance,[42] but also for those resulting from a negligent failure to refasten a gangplank after it has been made insecure by the act of a third person,[43] since there is a duty to see that a gangplank remains secure as well as fixing it that way at the outset.[44] Where passengers step directly from the vessel onto the dock, an insecure mooring of the vessel so as to permit it to swing away will render the vessel liable for injuries caused by a passenger's stepping in the opening which is occasioned.[45]

Use of lifeboats or tenders and assistance into them. If the rolling motion of a tender in which a passenger is about to embark from the vessel for shore is such as to be readily observable to him, and is not so great as to be dangerous to passengers apparently able to care for themselves, the vessel is not liable for injuries caused to the passenger by the rolling of the tender against him while he is attempting to step into it.[46] A seaman in assisting a passenger into a lifeboat need render, as to a normal appearing passenger, only such help as is usually needed by such persons as are apparently strong and able to care for themselves,[47] and if an apparently capable passenger feels the need of extra assistance he should ask for it.[48] If passengers overcrowd a small boat being used to carry passengers from shore to the vessel, it is the duty of the officer in charge to compel a sufficient number to get out or else refuse to start for the vessel until this is done;[49] and, if this is not done so that by reason of the overcrowding the boat capsizes on the way to the ship, the vessel owner is liable for injuries resulting to passengers [50]

d. Wharves, Docks, and Approaches

It is at least the duty of the owner of a vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers to keep in a reasonably safe condition the wharves, docks, or platforms on which passengers are invited for the purpose of waiting for, or going to, vessels.

Although it has been said that the high degree of care exacted of vessels with respect to the safety of passengers during the voyage does not extend to approaches used in taking passage,[51] and there is no liability for injuries where there has been no negligence,[52] it is at least the duty of the owner of a vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers to keep in a reasonably safe condition the wharves, docks, or platforms on which passengers are invited for the purpose of waiting for, or going to, vessels, and the owner is liable in damages for any injuries resulting to passengers because of a violation of this duty [53] Although a passenger has only a through ticket he does not forfeit his rights as a passenger by getting off at an intermediate port, and he may recover for injuries sustained by reason of the unsafe condition of a wharf at such port [54] Where a steamship company has provided a regular and safe approach to its dock, it is under no duty to maintain in a safe condition a short cut to the dock, which has been made by other persons, and which the company has never invited its passengers to use,[55] nor need it guard a passenger in using an ap-

e. Management and Navigation of Vessel

Unless exempted by statute, the owner of a vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers is under a duty to see that due care and precaution, for the safety of passengers, are exercised by those in charge of the management and navigation of the vessel, and the owner will be liable if a passenger is injured by any negligence either in management or navigation.

Unless exempted by statute, the owner of a vessel engaged in the carriage of passengers is under a duty to see that due care and precaution, for the safety of passengers, are exercised by those in charge of the management and navigation of the vessel, and the owner will be liable if a passenger is injured by any negligence either in management[57] or navigation.[58] Where navigation is beset by obvious or foreseeable perils, greater care in management and navigation of the vessel must be exercised than under ordinary circumstances;[59] but, although the captain of a passenger vessel which is navigating in waters made dangerous by the existence of conditions of warfare does not exactly follow the advice of the admiralty of his country as to the best method of avoiding the dangers involved, he cannot be deemed negligent in navigating the vessel if he uses his best judgment and adopts what, to one in his situation and with his skilled judgment, might well seem to be the proper course to pursue to secure the safety of those on board.[60] Statutory provisions exempting the owner from liability for damage or loss to merchandise or property resulting from faults or error in navigation where the owner has exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy apply only as between the vessel and the cargo and do not relieve the owner from liability for injuries sustained by a passenger due to the negligent management or navigation of the vessel,[61] even though the vessel engages in the carriage of merchandise as well as the carriage of passengers.[62]

Radio reports of approaching storms. Since the development of modern methods of broadcasting reports of future weather conditions, the failure to foresee the approach of an unprecedented hurricane, and faultless navigation in view of the information at hand, do not relieve the vessel from liability for injuries caused to passengers by such a storm when advance information of the approach of the hurricane could have readily been obtained by radio broadcast, but is not, and with such information the course of the vessel could have been so directed as to avoid the injuries sustained.[63]

Disasters. Although a disaster has caused a vessel to sink without any fault on the part of those in charge of her, they are bound to use the utmost exertions in their power to avert injury from the impending peril, and the shipowner's liability for injuries that could have been avoided by such exertions continues until the passengers are safely landed;[64] but errors in judgment in an emergency are not necessarily negligence,[65] and for them the ves-

Collision with pier

Where steamship crossing river in broad daylight under normal weather and tide conditions collided with pier with such force as materially to damage pier and injure passengers, in the absence of some intervening cause or showing that collision was result of inevitable accident or that it could not have been avoided by exercising due care, collision was result of poor seamanship and claimant was liable for such damage as libelants, who were passengers on such vessel, sustained as result of the collision.—Freund v. The Chauncey M. Depew, D.C.N.Y., 45 F.Supp. 263.

Degree of care and skill

(1) In actions growing out of injuries sustained by passengers of steamship, the jury must determine with respect to navigation whether master was attentive to his duties and exercised his skill and best judgment under any given circumstance, and, in addition, they must be satisfied that master exercised a very high degree of care and skill in so doing.—Voltmann v. United Fruit Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 147 F.2d 514.

(2) Where ship rolled so heavily in a storm that passengers were injured and principal issue was whether, in view of what knowledge of storm and of prevailing weather conditions master of ship was shown to have had, he took requisite precaution for safety of passengers, the giving of a binding instruction which forbade the jury to find that ship was negligently navigated provided master fairly exercised his own judgment and skill was error.—Voltmann v. United Fruit Co., supra.

Sudden jerk or stop

A carrier by water may be liable for injuries to a passenger resulting from an unnecessary, unusual, and sudden jerking or stopping of a boat, so violent as to indicate negligence.—Coney Island Co. v. Brown, 162 S.W.2d 785, 290 Ky. 750.

sel will not be responsible if the employees in charge are generally competent.[66] However, it has been held that a delay in sending S. O. S. messages requesting assistance for a sinking vessel constituted negligence.[67]

Other vessel of same line. Where a company is running several boats on the same line as carriers of passengers, it cannot escape liability for injuries sustained by a passenger in a collision of two of the boats by reason of the fact that due care has been exercised in the management of the boat on which the passenger is being carried; but it must exercise the same degree of vigilance and care in the management of the other boats employed in the same business.[68]

§ 194. —— Passenger's Contributory Negligence or Assumption of Risk

a. In general
b. Acts in disregard of warning
c. Particular instances of contributory negligence

a. In General

It is the duty of a passenger on a vessel to exercise for his own safety such care as an ordinarily prudent man would under the same circumstances, and it is the generally accepted rule that, although there has been negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees which contributes to the injuries, if a failure of the passenger to exercise ordinary care is proximately connected with the injuries, he is guilty of contributory negligence which will defeat his recovery.

The general rule of carriers, as applied to the carriage of passengers by water, makes it the duty of a passenger on a vessel to exercise for his own safety such care as an ordinarily prudent man would under the same circumstances;[69] and it is the generally accepted rule that, although there has been negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees which contributes to the injuries, if a failure of the passenger to exercise ordinary care is proximately connected with the injuries, he is guilty of contributory negligence which will defeat his recovery.[70] This rule does not make it the duty of the passenger to see that he is in fact safe;[71] but he need use only ordinary means to secure the safety that would exist under ordinary circumstances, except in so far as he is bound to perceive that the circumstances are in fact extraordinary.[72]

Comparative negligence doctrine. By some authorities, where the contributory negligence of the passenger is slight, he has not assumed the risk of the danger, and is not willfully, grossly, or inexcusably at fault, and the fault of the vessel is clear, the fault on the part of the passenger does not preclude his recovery entirely, but results merely in a division of the damages.[73]

Assumption of risk A passenger does not assume the risk of injury from dangers of which he has no knowledge or which he has no reason to anticipate,[74] but a passenger who voluntarily goes to a part of the vessel where there is a danger, of which he has knowledge, or which is obvious, thereby assumes the risk of such danger and cannot recover for injuries occasioned thereby.[75]

Persons under disability. The fact that a passenger is suffering from weakness or other physical disability does not place him under a duty to exercise a higher degree of care for his own safety.[76] He need exercise only the ordinary degree of care suggested by the circumstances, although it may be that he must consider his physical disabilities as a part of the circumstances and govern his conduct with a view to them.[77] The care required of a passenger who has voluntarily become intoxicated is the same as that of a passenger who is sober.[78] The mere fact that a passenger is intoxicated does not constitute contributory negligence,[79] but the fact of intoxication is a circumstance which may be considered in determining whether he exercised due care.[80]

The negligence of a child's parents or caretakers will not generally be imputed to the child so as to defeat his recovery for injuries caused him by the negligence of the vessel.[81] However, negligence on the part of an adult having charge of a child may tend to rebut the existence of negligence on the part of the vessel.[82]

Acts to avoid impending dangers. When a passenger in order to avoid an impending danger, occasioned by the carrier's negligence, does an act which as it subsequently develops contributes to the injury, such act does not constitute contributory negligence.[83]

Injury avoidable notwithstanding contributory negligence. Even where a passenger has been guilty of contributory negligence, such negligence will not defeat the action when it is shown that the vessel or its officers might, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, have avoided the consequences of the injured passenger's negligence.[84]

b. Acts in Disregard of Warning

If a passenger disregards a warning, which has been so given that he has notice of it, he cannot recover for injuries caused by the danger against which he has been warned.

It is not contributory negligence for a passenger to go to, or remain in, a place of danger, where he does not know of the danger, it is not obvious to him, and he has received no warning of it;[85] and the mere fact that a warning has been given does not make the passenger guilty of contributory negligence where he does not hear the warning or is not informed of it,[86] or the warning is inadequate,[87] but if a passenger disregards a warning, which has been so given that he has notice of it, he cannot recover for injuries caused by the danger against which he has been warned.[88]

c. Particular Instances of Contributory Negligence

Various instances have been considered by the courts and have been held to constitute or not to constitute contributory negligence depending on the circumstances of the particular case.

Various instances have been considered by the courts and have been held to constitute or not to constitute contributory negligence depending on the circumstances of the particular case.[89] A passenger who remains on deck, after having observed that the windows inclosing the deck are likely to be broken by high and stormy seas, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law for failing to remove to a place of safety.[90] So, also, there is contributory negligence where a passenger remains in a place where he is likely to be injured by the swinging of a gangplank after he has received a general warning of the danger and has had an opportunity to observe it;[91] where he refuses to leave a vessel which is about to sink;[92] where a passenger in playing on a railed-off portion of the deck, the dangers of which he has had an opportunity to observe, steps back without looking into an uncovered hold close to the place where a mast comes through the floor of the deck,[93] or where a drunken passenger, without the knowledge of the vessel's employees, gets into a yawl which the vessel has in tow and then stumbles or slips into the water in an attempt to get back to the vessel.[94]

On the other hand, to take a particular position on the vessel is not contributory negligence where the danger of such a position is not so obvious or well-known that an ordinarily prudent man would hesitate to take it.[95] The mere fact that a passenger steps on a slippery deck does not establish contributory negligence in the absence of a showing that the passenger knew the deck was slippery.[96] A passenger is not precluded from recovering for an assault made on her in her stateroom by reason of the fact that she did not examine the bolt of a door to an adjoining room, through which the assailant entered, after every absence from the stateroom, when she had examined the bolt on first coming aboard and found it to be locked.[97]

Conduct preparatory to leaving vessel. Where the vessel has negligently constructed its seats on a raised platform above the aisle, a passenger who, in a moment of forgetfulness, in the haste of embarking, steps over the edge of such platform is not guilty of contributory negligence simply because he must have learned of the existence of the rise when he first entered his seat.[98] It is not necessarily contributory negligence for a passenger to leave his seat when the vessel is about to dock,[99] or to start descending a stair, at such time, without taking hold of the handrails,[1] where the injury results from the vessel's striking the landing with unusual violence. A passenger, who shortly after the vessel arrives at the port of destination goes on the main deck to look for baggage, for which no check has been given him, is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence so as to bar recovery for injuries sustained by falling in a hatchway carelessly left uncovered, without sufficient lights or sign of warning.[2]

Boarding or getting off vessel. Where a proper and safe way has been provided for passengers to get on and off the vessel, a passenger who disregards such way and chooses another and more dangerous way, which is not intended for his use, is guilty of contributory negligence and cannot recover for injuries sustained in the use of such way.[3] It is also contributory negligence for a passenger who is alighting in broad daylight to step off the end of a gangplank without looking to see whether or not there is a step there.[4] The fact that a person who has come on board is deprived of a safe mode of landing by reason of the vessel's starting to leave without giving him a proper warning does not justify him in adopting another mode which is also dangerous.[5] In getting into a tender which has come alongside to take passengers ashore a passenger must exercise due care for his own safety,[6] and if he carelessly fails to watch the gunwale as he is about to step over it he cannot recover for injuries caused by the tender being bumped against his leg by a roll of the sea.[7]

time,[9] is guilty of contributory negligence which precludes his recovery for injuries sustained in so attempting to get on or off the vessel.[10]

Although the apparent methods provided for getting on or off a vessel are obviously dangerous, the vessel or owner will be liable for injuries sustained by a passenger in attempting to use them if employees have given instructions to make the attempt,[11] or if the conduct of the vessel or its employees has been such as to mislead the passenger into believing that a temporary and dangerous method of getting ashore is the only one to be provided.[12] After a vessel has landed, the usual signals given that it has been made fast, and the chains in front of the passenger gates have been left down, a passenger has a right to assume that there is no open space between the vessel and the dock, and he is not guilty of contributory negligence for failing to look at the time he steps from the boat to the dock to see whether there is any opening.[13]

§ 195. —— Limitation of, or Exemption from, Liability

a. In general
b Notice of claim
c. Contractual limitation of time to sue

a. In General

Under admiralty and maritime law, ordinarily a stipulation in the contract of carriage exempting or relieving the vessel from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of itself or its servants is void and unenforceable, and by statute a carrier by water may be prohibited from contracting against liability for loss of life or bodily injury.

Although in England a steamship company engaged in the carriage of passengers can by stipulation in the contract of carriage relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of itself or its servants,[14] where the contract of carriage is wholly maritime and properly of admiralty jurisdiction, admiralty or general maritime law as announced or developed by the courts of the United States, or as modified by statute, is the law which determines whether the contractual limitation of liability is valid,[15] and under such law ordinarily a stipulation in the contract of carriage exempting or relieving the vessel from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of itself or its servants is void and unenforceable against the injured passenger;[16] irrespective of whether or not a carrier by water can limit the extent of its liability for injuries caused by defects in the vessel or the negligence of the vessel's servants, such a provision is invalid if the amount of the limitation is unreasonable.[17]

In the absence of statutory prohibition,[18] it has been held that the vessel may, for a sufficient consideration passing to the passenger,[19] such as a reduction in rates,[20] stipulate for an exemption from liability for its negligence,[21] although as to a passenger for hire a contract limiting a vessel's liability for negligence is void unless the passenger is given the option of purchasing a ticket under which liability is unlimited.[22] It has also been held that stipulations in a free pass exempting the vessel from liability for injury occasioned by negligence, or providing that the passenger assumes all risk of injury, with qualifications, later appearing, as to degrees of negligence, have been held valid and binding on the passenger,[23] even though notice of

Mere statement in the ticket that "the price of passage hereunder has been fixed partly with reference to the liability assumed by the company as defined by this contract" is not of itself sufficient to show any consideration for an exemption from liability for the carrier's negligence.—Murray v. 22. Reduced or alternative rates

Steamship passenger will not be deemed to have assented to a stipulation in his ticket exempting the carrier from liability for injuries caused by the latter's negligence, where it is not shown that the ticket was sold at a reduced rate or that there was a higher rate the passenger could have paid to secure full protection.—Murray v. Cunard S. S. Co., supra.

such stipulation may not have been brought home to the passenger, as discussed supra § 182; and a pass with such a stipulation has been held not only to exempt the person who issues it, but also the person or company who owns the vessel,[24] although such a stipulation would not exempt the carrier from liability for injuries inflicted intentionally or wantonly.[25]

The provisions of statute, 46 U S.C A. § 183c, prohibiting a carrier by water from contracting against liability for loss of life or bodily injury are of general import,[26] and were enacted for the purpose of regulating the relationship between a common carrier of passengers and passengers with respect to the duties, obligations, and restrictions of the carrier in connection with the issuance of tickets and its liability to the passengers for safe passage thereunder,[27] and are declarative of a public policy on the subject.[28] Such provisions do not merely prohibit limitations as to the amount of liability but prohibit limitations as to liability.[29] Thus, where a ticket is expressly written subject to all provisions of named statutes, including statutory provisions governing the amount of liability, and on its face all limitations are expressly modified in accordance with the statutory requirements, limitations in the ticket on the liability to the passengers are either void because contrary to the statute,[30] or nonexistent because excluded by the express reference to the statute,[31] but such a statute has been held not to apply to private vessels operated by a federal agency under certain circumstances[32]

Where the law of the place where the contract is made governs, as where the contract for carriage to this country is made in a foreign country between a foreign steamship company and a passenger, as discussed supra § 182, it is only fair to require notice in the contract of passage that such passengers are entitled to receive, at the hands of the carrier, a lesser degree of care than those who travel on American ships.[33]

General rules applicable in statutory proceedings to limit liability, discussed infra §§ 239–257, apply in proceedings by the owner of a vessel for exoneration from liability for injury to a passenger.[34]

Weight and sufficiency of evidence

(1) Evidence was held to fail to establish that master of launch had been negligent either in failing to remain close at hand while passenger was climbing the Jacob's ladder or in failing to render prompt aid when passenger fell from the ladder.—Petition of Minerva Boat Co, supra,

(2) Evidence was held to establish that loss of all passengers on sinking of vessel was not attributable to any insufficiency of lifeboats, that failure to remove passengers from vessel before it sank to other vessels standing by was due to weather conditions and high seas, and that loss of all passengers on sinking of vessel was not due to insufficiency of manning.—The Princess Sophia,

b. Notice of Claim

The courts have generally recognized that a carrier by water, in the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, may legally enter into a contract of carriage with a passenger requiring the passenger to give written notice of his claim within a specified time in order to hold the carrier for personal injuries.

The courts have generally recognized that a carrier by water, in the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, may legally enter into a contract of carriage with a passenger requiring the passenger to give written notice of his claim within a specified time in order to hold the carrier for personal injuries,[35] and such a stipulation will be enforced providing the time for such notice is just, fair, and reasonable.[36] The fact that the injuries for which suit is brought have so disabled the passenger as to render prompt compliance impossible may cause the time limitation to be held unreasonable as to him.[37] Such limitations have their justification in the need of some safeguard to protect the carrier against frauds,[38] and are not against public policy,[39] and do not operate as a limitation of the liability of the carrier,[40] as they do not purport wholly or partially to exonerate the carrier from liability,[41] but simply regulate the manner and time of filing the claim,[42] and, hence, no independent consideration is necessary,[43] since, as long as such stipulations are reasonable, they are supported by the consideration supporting the contract of carriage.[44]

The statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183b, prescribing the minimum period of time for the giving of notice of a claim for loss of life or bodily injuries which may be inserted in the contract of carriage is one of general import,[45] and was enacted for the purpose of regulating the relationship between a common carrier and passengers with respect to the duties, obligations, and restrictions of the carrier in connection with the issuance of tickets and its liability to the passengers for safe passage thereunder.[46] It has been held that this statute creates a new public policy as to what is just, fair, and reasonable,[47] as it arbitrarily prescribes a minimum period of time for making a claim which may be provided for by the contract of carriage,[48] and renders ineffective a stipulation in the contract of carriage which requires the filing of a claim within a period less than that prescribed by the statute;[49] but where the provision of the contract of carriage as to notice of claim is in conformity with the statute, it is binding on the passenger.[50] Such statute has been construed as applying to claims for damages legally recoverable by reason of bodily injuries sustained by a passenger,[51] and has been held applicable to interstate voyages between domestic ports,[52] but such a provision, being prospective, does not apply to contracts entered into prior to its passage.[53] Furthermore, as such legislation supersedes state legislation on the subject, a limitation of the character under consideration in a contract of carriage which is in conformity with the statue is valid and enforceable, notwithstanding any state legislation to the contrary.[54]

Requisites and sufficiency of notice. There must be a substantial compliance with the provisions of the contract of carriage requiring notice within a specified time,[55] although technical and complete compliance is not always required.[56] Where a written notice is required, it has been held that such notice must be one showing that it is intended to fix rights.[57] Where the contract of carriage provides for giving written notice of claim within a specified time, it has been held that the institution of an action for the injuries within the time stipulated is a sufficient compliance[58] It has also been held that the fact that agents of the carrier have knowledge of the injury does not of itself excuse the failure of the passenger to comply with the provisions as to notice,[59] and an injured passenger is not excused from giving notice of his claim by reason of the fact that his injuries become aggravated after debarkation so as to increase the amount of his claim.[60]

On the other hand, it has been held that although the time allowed by the ticket for the giving of notices of claims is unreasonable and too short, this does not excuse the passenger from giving any notice at all.[61] In such a case the only right the passenger can claim is that the time limit be expanded to sustain the validity of a notice actually given within a reasonable time.[62] Therefore, if, in such a case, no notice at all has been given, no action can be maintained.[63]

Waiver. Stipulations as to notice are subject to defeat by waiver.[64] In general, agents authorized to receive claims or notices for damages have power to waive compliance with provisions of the contract of carriage requiring filing of claims or notices within a specified time,[65] but where the contract of carriage

Oral waiver

Where steamship company's claim agent, when asked whether it was necessary to file any form of claim and if they had any forms, or not, answered "No," the "No" could reasonably apply to both parts of the question, resulting in oral waiver of provision requiring filing of claim for injuries within thirty days — Hubbard v. provides that no agent or employee of the carrier has power to waive such provision, an agent or employee has no authority to waive the provision.[66]

c. Contractual Limitation of Time to Sue

In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it is usually held or recognized that a carrier by water and a passenger have a legal right to limit the time within which to sue, and such a limitation will be enforced where the contract period is reasonable.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it is usually held or recognized that a carrier by water and a passenger have a legal right to limit the time within which to sue,[67] and, where the contract period is reasonable, it will be enforced.[68] Stipulations of this character are not opposed to public policy,[69] and do not operate as a limitation of the liability of the carrier,[70] as they do not purport, either wholly or partially, to exonerate the carrier from liability,[71] but simply regulate the manner and time of bringing suit.[72] No independent consideration is necessary to support such a stipulation,[73] since, as long as it is reasonable, it is supported by the consideration supporting the contract of carriage.[74]

The right to agree on a limitation of time to sue has been given legislative recognition by the provisions of the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183b, which prescribe a minimum period of limitation for the bringing of a suit for claims for death or bodily injury which may be inserted in the contract of carriage,[75] and where the contractual limitation is in conformity with this statute, failure to bring the action within the time fixed by the contractual provision bars relief.[76] The statute has been construed as applying to claims for damages legally recoverable by reason of bodily injuries sustained by a passenger,[77] and has been held applicable to interstate voyages between domestic ports,[78] but such provision, being prospective, does not apply to contracts entered into prior to its passage.[79] It has been held that a valid limitation in a contract of carriage requiring suit to be brought within a designated time in conformity with the statute is not affected by another limitation in the contract which is void because it is a violation of statutory provisions.[80] Furthermore, as such legislation supersedes state legislation on the subject, a limitation of the character under consideration in a contract of carriage which is in conformity with the statute is valid and enforceable, notwithstanding any state legislation to the contrary.[81] However, the statute

69. Cal.—Hubbard v. Matson Nav. Co., supra.

Extension
Even if provision in passenger ticket contract that action for injuries sustained while aboard steamship must be brought within one year from date of injury could be extended so that such period would begin to run on return of passenger from abroad, where passenger did not bring action until almost twenty-five months after injury occurred and almost twenty months after return from abroad, it would be unreasonable to extend such provision for that period.—Horvath v. Cunard S. S. Co., D.C.N.Y., 103 F.Supp. 356.

Statutory suspension of limitation
Where an action by wife to recover for personal injuries and by husband for loss of services was brought against steamship company in federal court and action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, complaint in action which was subsequently brought in state court was not subject to dismissal because action was not commenced within time limited by contract of passage, in view of statute permitting commencement of a new action after expiration of time limit for bringing action, where a former action was terminated because plaintiffs had mistaken their forum.—Gustafson v. Preemption of field
Federal statute pertaining to time limitations that may be imposed by shipowners for institution of suits

prescribing a minimum period for the institution of suit which may be incorporated in the contract of carriage does not operate as a statute of limitations,[82] and prohibit a court from entertaining an action on a foreign tort unless it is commenced within the statutory prescribed period.[83] In other words, the statute does not declare a public policy against allowing a suit to be filed after the expiration of the prescribed statutory period, if, by the law of the foreign country within whose territory the tort occurred and in which the ticket was issued, the passenger is not contractually bound by the provision requiring suit to be brought within the prescribed statutory period.[84]

Since the provisions which appear in the contract of carriage are binding on the passenger regardless of whether or not they are read, as discussed supra § 182, the lack of knowledge of a provision in the contract of carriage requiring the maintenance of suit within a specified time does not excuse the passenger from complying with it.[85] Whether the passenger is so physically incapacitated as to excuse him from complying with the provision depends on the circumstances of the particular case.[86]

Waiver and estoppel. Stipulations limiting the time in which suit may be brought are subject to defeat by waiver[87] or estoppel.[88] A waiver, in order to be effective, must be made by the carrier or its duly authorized agent.[89]

§ 196. Passengers' Baggage or Effects

a. In general
b. Liability for passenger's baggage or effects

a. In General

It is impliedly a part of the contract of carriage between a common carrier by water and a passenger that the former will carry for the latter his personal baggage, under reasonable limitations as to weight and value, without additional charge, and the carrier has a lien on the baggage for the charge of the transportation of the passenger and baggage.

It is impliedly a part of the contract between a common carrier by water and a passenger that the former will carry for the latter his personal baggage, under reasonable limitations as to weight and value, without additional charge, as the price paid for the ticket or transportation embraces compensation for the carriage of the baggage, and no special consideration need be paid.[90] In the absence of any valid and controlling law or regulation to the contrary, a carrier by water may make an extra charge for the value of baggage beyond a certain limit, for weight beyond a reasonable limit, or for the carriage of property not ordinarily regarded as baggage.[91] Such a transaction may be treated as a separate contract,[92] but the mere fact that over-on claims for loss of life or bodily injury is a declaration of congressional policy as lawful contractual time limitations which preempts the field and which in the interest of uniformity should be construed to exclude state statutes of limitations — Scheibel v. Agwilines, Inc., supra.

Cunard S.S. Co., D.C.N.Y., 103 F.Supp. 356.

87. Acts held not waiver
(1) An offer of settlement after contractual limitation period has elapsed is ineffective as a waiver of limitation —Scheibel v. Agwilines, Inc., C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 636.

(2) A provision, in steamship company's contract of passage, that suit for injuries must be brought within ninety days, was not waived by letter from company's claim agent, written long after the ninety days had expired, stating that investigation had disclosed contributory negligence and denying liability —Hubbard v. weight charges are paid does not convert the baggage into freight.[93]

Baggage checks. The usual baggage check delivered to a passenger on receiving his baggage in no sense embodies the contract of carriage between the passenger and the common carrier by water, but is a receipt merely, intended to afford evidence of ownership and for identifying the baggage.[94]

Lien on baggage. A common carrier by water has a lien on the baggage of a passenger for the entire charge of transportation of the passenger and baggage, and it is immaterial whether the baggage has been checked, if it is still in the possession of the carrier when it seeks to enforce its lien,[95] unless the carrier is estopped to assert the lien.[96]

b. Liability for Passenger's Baggage or Effects

(1) In general
(2) Property to which liability extends
(3) Baggage in passenger's custody or stateroom
(4) Passenger not accompanying baggage
(5) Theft or conversion
(6) Contributory negligence
(7) Commencement, continuance, and termination of liability

(1) In General

In the absence of statutory or contractual exemption or modification, the liability of a vessel or owner for the baggage of a passenger is that of an insurer if the baggage is lost, stolen, or injured, unless the proximate cause of the injury is an act of God or a peril of the sea.

In the absence of a statutory or contractual exemption or modification,[97] the liability of a vessel or owner for the baggage of a passenger is the same as that for merchandise or goods being carried for hire; hence, if baggage is lost, injured, or stolen, the liability is that of an insurer,[98] unless the proximate cause of the injury is an act of God or a peril of the sea,[99] or the negligence of the passenger himself, considered infra subdivision b (6) of this section

What law governs. The liability of the owner of the vessel for a passenger's baggage is generally governed by the law of the place where the contract of transportation was made.[1]

(2) Property to Which Liability Extends general proposition this is regarded as including whatever articles a passenger usually takes with him for his own personal use, comfort, and convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with respect to his immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey.[3]

Proper "baggage" may include wearing apparel such as is necessary for the reasonable use of the passenger according to his circumstances and condition in life,[4] or even cloth in a reasonable amount which has been procured for making wearing apparel,[5] but it is not confined to such articles,[6] although an early case does contain a suggestion to this effect.[7] Under various circumstances "baggage" has been held to include jewelry and similar articles;[8] guns of a sportsman;[9] manuscripts of a professor or student,[10] price books of a traveling salesman;[11] extra lens for the camera of a newspaper photographer,[12] the necessary instruments of a traveling dentist;[13] and even the bedding[14] or household furnishings[15] of a steerage or immigrant passenger. Ordinarily it seems that valuable securities are not among the things which a passenger can reasonably be expected to carry on his journey;[16] but a vessel has been held responsible for the loss of liberty bonds where their rate of return is so low that the passenger cannot afford to keep them in a safety box and almost of necessity must carry them with him.[17]

A passenger is entitled to carry as a part of his baggage, and to hold the carrier responsible for, such an amount of money as is reasonably necessary to defray his expenses for the entire journey;[18] but for sums in excess of this,[19] or money carried merely for transportation or business purposes,[20] no responsibility is ordinarily assumed. Should the owner or master of the vessel gratuitously accept on deposit, and undertake to care for, money which a passenger is not entitled to carry as baggage, it seems that the owner thereby becomes responsible as a gratuitous bailee,[21] but a passenger cannot impose such responsibility on the owner by depositing the money with a clerk or other employee on the vessel, unless it is shown that the deposit was made in accordance with a well-known usage, or some authority given by the owner.[22]

Presents or property of others. The vessel owner's responsibility as an insurer ordinarily does not extend to articles intended as presents,[23] or property being carried by a passenger for the convenience of another person;[24] but the owner is responsible to a father for property which he is carrying in his trunk for a daughter who is traveling with him.[25]

Liability for, and effect of, concealment of improper baggage. Although the vessel owner may become responsible for property which a passenger cannot properly carry as baggage by reason of the making of an extra charge for its carriage,[26] or ac-

Contents in nature of baggage
In passenger's action for loss of trunk between Havre and Paris against ocean carrier specially contracting to carry trunk from New York to Paris, defendant's liability was that of common carrier as far as trunk contents were in nature of baggage, and that of bailee as to different contents, unless defendant knew contents might be of different nature—Wiener v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, C.C.A N.Y., 61 F.2d 893.

cepting it as baggage with knowledge of its nature,[27] if, without the knowledge of the vessel or its employees, a passenger conceals with his proper baggage property which cannot be classified as such, it seems that for the latter property no responsibility whatsoever is assumed, not even for gross negligence.[28] Such a concealment, however, does not relieve the vessel from responsibility for that which is properly baggage and for a loss of this the passenger may still recover,[29] but, where a passenger who has money in his trunk, on being questioned about its contents, replies that it contains only clothing, the vessel is not liable for the loss of the trunk.[30]

(3) Baggage in Passenger's Custody or Stateroom

As a general rule the vessel is not liable for injuries to, or losses of, articles or baggage which the passenger retains in his exclusive control and possession, unless there has been negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees.

As a general rule the vessel is not liable for injuries to, or losses of, articles or baggage which the passenger retains in his exclusive control and possession, unless there has been negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees.[31] In a majority of jurisdictions this rule appears to have been extended to hand luggage which the passenger takes with him to his stateroom, and articles which he ordinarily wears about the person but on the particular occasion has deposited in the stateroom.[32] Negligence in failing to provide adequate locks or a sufficient watch for passengers in their staterooms will make the vessel owner liable for property stolen therefrom;[33] and the owner is liable if baggage which a passenger is entitled to take to his cabin is injured by reason of its being wrongfully excluded therefrom;[34] but, in the absence of negligence there is, under the majority rule, no liability.[35]

New York rule. In New York, when there is no regulation of which the passenger has notice requiring him to place his baggage elsewhere, the vessel owner is regarded as coming under a liability similar to that of an innkeeper for the personal baggage or articles of apparel that a passenger leaves in his stateroom, and he is responsible for loss or injury of such property unless caused by act of God or negligence of the passenger.[36] However, this liability does not arise until the baggage has actually been placed in the stateroom,[37] and, if baggage is lost when beside the passenger while he is waiting on deck to get a stateroom assigned him, the general rule as to liability for baggage in the custody of the passgener applies.[38]

Regulations forbidding baggage in stateroom. There are statements to the effect that a regulation forbidding a passenger, who has paid for a stateroom, from taking his baggage with him into it, except at his own risk, is unreasonable and invalid, as far as light baggage containing only articles needed for present use in travel is concerned;[39] and a duly posted notice in the stateroom that valuables be deposited with the purser does not deprive the passenger of his right to keep jewelry, or other articles of personal convenience that are constantly worn, in the stateroom.[40]

(4) Passenger Not Accompanying Baggage

Where, through the fault of the passenger, the baggage is not transported on the same vessel on which the passenger travels, but is placed on another vessel as freight for which the carrier is entitled to compensation, the vessel has been held liable as an insurer, but, where the baggage is forwarded at a later date without charge, it has been held that the vessel's liability is that of a gratuitous bailee only.

Where a passenger takes passage on one vessel, but his baggage does not reach him at the port of departure in time to go on that vessel, and as a consequence he sails without it, it being put on another vessel which gives a receipt or bill of lading for it, the situation becomes one of ordinary shipment of freight,[41] and the vessel becomes entitled to compensation and a lien therefor,[42] and is liable as an insurer, even though the compensation has not yet been paid,[43] but, if the baggage is forwarded at a later date without charge, the contract is one of bailment for the benefit of the passenger as bailor, and the vessel's liability is that of a gratuitous bailee only.[44] A refusal of passage to a passenger terminates the contract of carriage and, if the vessel sails, without giving the passenger a reasonable opportunity to remove his luggage, the shipowner is liable as a trespasser for carrying the baggage away.[45] If the passenger is left behind due to mistake, the master is, at least, liable for failure to exercise ordinary care for the safety of the passenger's baggage which remains on board.[46]

(5) Theft or Conversion

The vessel owner's liability as an insurer extends, for baggage in its exclusive possession, to all cases of theft, robbery, and embezzlement by any of the crew or by other persons, notwithstanding the carrier may have exercised every vigilance to prevent loss.

The vessel owner's liability as an insurer extends, for baggage in its exclusive possession, to all cases of theft, robbery, and embezzlement by any of the crew or by other persons, notwithstanding the carrier may have exercised every vigilance to prevent loss.[47] In addition, the absolute undertaking of a vessel to protect passengers against the misconduct of its own servants requires not only protection of the passenger in his person, but also in his possessions,[48] and the carrier is liable if an employee steals property from a passenger's stateroom,[49] or if out of spite one of the vessel's officers seizes a passenger's personal baggage and throws it into the sea.[50]

(6) Contributory Negligence

The contributory negligence of a passenger may defeat his right to recover for injury to, or loss of, baggage.

The vessel's liability does not extend to losses of, or injuries to, baggage, that are proximately caused by the negligence of the passenger himself,[51] but negligence on the part of the passenger does not excuse if the proximate cause is the negligence of the vessel or its employees.[52] Furthermore, where a vessel has obtained exclusive possession of a passenger's baggage, as where it is carried in the hold or a baggage room, and thereby becomes an insurer, contributory negligence of the passenger is no defense and is not to be considered.[53]

(7) Commencement, Continuance, and Termination of Liability

The liability of a vessel as an insurer for the baggage of a passenger commences when the baggage is delivered to, and accepted by, the carrier. Its liability continues until the baggage has been delivered to the passenger at the port of destination on demand made within a reasonable time.

The responsibility of a vessel, as an insurer for the baggage of a passenger, commences with the delivery of such baggage to, and the acceptance by, an agent authorized to receive baggage,[54] but not before.[55] If there has in fact been a delivery and an acceptance, the mere fact that no check or receipt is issued to the passenger is unimportant,[56] and, if baggage is accepted in advance of the time of sailing, but for the company's convenience is stored on the dock instead of being placed immediately on the vessel, the liability of the carrier during such period of storage is that of an insurer and not that of a warehouseman.[57] Although it may be doubtful whether liability as an insurer attaches on an employee's undertaking to aid a passenger in carrying his personal luggage to his stateroom,[58] the vessel owner is at least liable for any injuries or losses that result from the negligence of the employee during the time he is assisting in taking the baggage to the stateroom.[59]

Continuance and termination of liability; delivery. Ordinarily the liability of a vessel for a passenger's baggage continues until it has been delivered to him at the port of destination on demand made within a reasonable time.[60] After the vessel has arrived in port the owner has a right to require that passengers remove their baggage within a reasonable time so as to discharge further responsibility for its safe-keeping,[61] and, where property is not removed before a reasonable time has elapsed, the vessel owner is thereafter liable only for losses caused by his negligence or that of his servants.[62] Where the passenger has died during the voyage, liability as an insurer is terminated by a delivery of the baggage at the port of destination to his personal representative.[63] Likewise, liability as an insurer is terminated by a delivery of the baggage to the immigration officials, where such is required by law;[64] and, where there is nothing to show a special contract to deliver a passenger's baggage to a particular place or city in the port of destination, the vessel discharges its responsibility by delivering the baggage to the place in the port of destination, fixed by the established usage and custom of the carrier.[65]

Connecting carrier. A carrier by water selling a through ticket and checking a passenger's baggage through to a point beyond its lines has been held to undertake, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, to insure the safe delivery of such baggage at the point to which the ticket is sold,[66] and is, therefore, liable for loss of, or injury to, such baggage wherever it occurs, the connecting carriers being regarded only as its agents in transporting the baggage.[67]

§ 197. —— Limitation of, or Exemption from, Liability

A carrier by water may, by stipulation, limit or modify its liability as an insurer of baggage, and may, by stipulation, limit its liability to a certain amount, but it may not in general stipulate for exemption from all liability for injury to, or losses of, baggage resulting from its own negligence or that of its servants.

The general rule is that a carrier by water may, by stipulation, limit or modify its liability as an insurer of baggage,[68] but that it cannot stipulate for exemption from all liability for injury to, or losses of, baggage resulting from its own negligence or that of its servants.[69] Stipulations limiting liability to a certain sum, unless express valuation is declared and extra rates are paid, have been sustained in some cases,[70] and are not against public

Liability measured by valuation
Where language of valuation clause on passenger ticket contains notice to passenger of agreed valuation or limitation, unless higher value is declared on baggage and increased compensation paid to ocean carrier, carrier's liability must be measured by ordinary valuation, since it has received only ordinary rate.—The Levi-policy,[71] and have even been held to apply where the loss of baggage results from the negligence of the vessel's employees.[72] Such limitations, however, have been held unenforceable where the amount fixed is unreasonable,[73] or where the limitation is unaccompanied by any right to increase the amount by an adequate and reasonable proportional payment,[74] although it has been stated that a limitation is not defeated by the fact that the passenger was not offered any real choice of rates and was not adequately informed that an alternative rate existed.[75]

In New York it has been made quite plain that a vessel owner can, by a clear and explicit stipulation, limit his liability even for losses of baggage occasioned by his negligence or that of his servants,[76] and the courts of that jurisdiction have quite uniformly enforced stipulations limiting liability to a certain amount, unless excess value is declared and extra rates paid.[77]

Construction and operation of limitation clauses Stipulations or conditions in the passage contract which profess to modify the vessel owner's liability for passengers' baggage are construed most strongly against the carrier,[78] and in the light of public policy,[79] and are held inoperative when not clearly applicable to the situation presented.[80] Although losses occasioned by negligence have been held covered by a stipulation which simply limits liability for baggage to a certain sum, unless the excess value is declared and extra rates paid,[81] there is some authority to the effect that negligence must be specifically mentioned before a clause exempting from liability will cover losses occurring from such cause,[82] and that general words such as "from any cause arising" might be limited to such extraordinary liabilities as carriers are under without fault or negligence on their part,[83] as every presumption is against an intention to contract for immunity from negligence,[84] and such contracts will not be so construed unless expressed in unequivocal terms.[85]

Two contracts

Pursuant to text rule, the vessel should not be permitted to enter into two contracts with a passenger and place itself in a position where it could claim either was a binding agreement depending on circumstances and jurisdiction, and, hence, where passenger ticket for passage on vessel contained limitations as to liability of carrier for loss of baggage, receipts for baggage subsequently issued which were invalid because they purported to exempt carrier from all liability, supplanted original contract provision with respect to baggage and full value of lost baggage could be recovered from carrier by passengers.—Scire v. Furthermore, where a special and independent contract is made for the carriage of excess baggage, limitations of liability expressed in the ticket place no limitation on the liability under the special contract.[86]

Notice of claim. In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, provisions requiring a written notice of claim for loss of, or injuries to, baggage or effects are valid and are very generally upheld,[87] but, if such stipulations are unreasonable, they are void as against public policy.[88] There must be a substantial compliance with the contract requiring notice within a specified time.[89] Stipulations as to notice of claim may be waived,[90] but a waiver, in order to be effective, must be made by the carrier or its authorized agent.[91]

Contractual limitation as to time of bringing suit. In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it has been held that the parties have a legal right to agree on a limitation of time within which to sue,[92] and, where the contract period is reasonable, it will be enforced.[93]

§ 198. Actions

Under the maritime law a contract for the carriage of passengers imposes a lien on the vessel to secure its performance, and in case of a breach the passenger may bring an admiralty suit in rem for the enforcement of his lien. An action for money had and received is a proper form of action to recover passage money paid in advance. The passenger must ordinarily comply with valid conditions precedent before he can maintain a suit or action for the cause specified.

Under the maritime law a contract for the carriage of passengers imposes a lien on the vessel to secure its performance, in the same manner as does a contract for the carriage of mechandise on freight, and in case of breach the passenger may bring an admiralty suit in rem for the enforcement of his lien.[94] According to some authorities this liability attaches to the vessel as soon as the contract of carriage is entered into, and a suit in rem may be maintained, even though the breach occurs before the vessel has actually entered on performance of the contract.[95] Other cases, however, have established, what is probably the majority rule, that the vessel does not become liable until performance of the contract has been entered into by the receipt of the passenger, or his baggage, on board, and for breaches occurring before that time no suit in rem can be maintained.[96] One who is not a passenger cannot maintain a suit in rem against the vessel to recover damages arising from an assault by an officer of the vessel.[97] An action for money had and

Oral report

A steamship passenger who failed to comply with requirement in passage contract that written claim with respect to property be lodged with purser prior to passenger's leaving steamer, or lodged with carrier within a designated number of days after leaving steamer, was not entitled to recover from steamship company for damages to personal property, although he had reported the loss orally to purser who took notes on the claim.—Rosenthal v. received is a proper form of action to recover passage money paid in advance;[98] and trespass may be maintained where a passenger is refused passage and the vessel sails away with his baggage without giving him an opportunity to remove it,[99] although conversion will not lie against a vessel for negligence [1]

Statutory remedies against vessel. Some statutes make the vessel liable for any damages arising out of the breach of a contract for the transportation of persons [2] Under a statute providing that vessels navigating within the state shall be liable for injuries to passengers by officers of the boat, it has been held that the vessel stands as a substitute for the officer who commits the injury and that any action which could be maintained against the officer may be maintained against the vessel.[3]

Attachment. A passenger's claim for the loss of baggage is not a demand for a debt, but is a claim for unliquidated damages, and a foreign attachment will not lie to enforce such a claim where the existence of a debt is prerequisite.[4]

Jurisdiction. In accordance with the general rule discussed in Courts § 77, where a nonresident passenger sues a nonresident owner of a vessel for loss of baggage, a state court may in its discretion refuse to accept jurisdiction.[5]

Conditions precedent. Valid stipulations requiring passengers to give written notice of their claims within a specified time in order to hold the carrier liable because of personal injuries, as discussed supra § 195 b, loss of, or injuries to, baggage, considered supra § 197, or abandonment of the voyage, discussed infra § 202, form, if the time limit is reasonable, valid conditions precedent with which the passenger must ordinarily comply before he can maintain a suit or action for the cause specified.[6] The fact that the passenger is a minor, and that the ticket was purchased by his parents, does not relieve him from compliance with such a condition where the contract of carriage is relied on as the basis of the cause of action.[7]

According to some authorities the burden of proving compliance with such a condition is on the passenger, and it is not necessary for the vessel owner to plead noncompliance,[8] but according to other authorities a failure of defendant to set up the condition, or plead noncompliance, will cause the condition to be waived [9]

Parties. The transferee of a passage ticket can bring a suit in personam in his own name, in admiralty, for a breach of the contract contained in the ticket [10] A person checking baggage in connection with his transportation as passenger may bring an action for breach of contract with respect to such baggage, although he is not the real owner thereof.[11]

Process. The owner of a vessel, residing without the jurisdiction, cannot, in an action against him for injuries resulting from the improper conduct of the master toward a passenger, be brought into court by a service of citation on the master;[12] and a foreign and alien corporate owner of a vessel which maintains an office in a state for the mere solicitation of business, but has no property in the state and carries on no transportation therein, is not doing business in the state and jurisdiction cannot be had of such a corporation by service of a summons on the general agent in charge of the office in the state in a personal injury action by a passenger.[13]

must show a duty owing to plaintiff and a breach of that duty by defendant, resulting in injury to plaintiff.[15] If this is done, the complaint is sufficient,[16] but an allegation that plaintiff was "lawfully and rightfully" on the vessel at the time of an injury is insufficient to show the relationship of carrier and passenger and to charge defendant with the duties of such relationship;[17] and, in an action to recover the purchase price of a ticket, the petition does not sufficiently state a cause of action if it simply alleges that defendant has canceled the ticket and stopped passage, since it must be shown that the cancellation was wrongful and made under such circumstances that the law will impose an obligation on defendant to refund the purchase price.[18] In an action for damages sustained by reason of the explosion of a steamboat, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the master and owners, an averment of strict compliance on the part of the proprietors with the requirements of statute, relating to steamboats, which creates a presumption of negligence from the bursting of a boiler, as discussed infra § 200 a (1), has been held to be insufficient as a defense, without the further allegation of care and a denial of negligence.[19]

Issues, proof, and variance. As in other civil actions the issues, in an action by a passenger against a carrier by water, are confined to those raised by the pleadings, and proof may be made of matters in issue.[20] Allegations as to the existence of a contract of carriage need not be sustained by proof of a formal contract, as the obligation of the carrier is implied from the undertaking to transport the passenger.[21] In an action to recover for refusal to transport, evidence that, under the immigration laws, the vessel could not properly transport the persons refused is inadmissible under a general denial, as the defense of illegality must be separately pleaded, unless the illegality is shown by the complaint or evidence of plaintiff.[22] Likewise, a general denial does not permit the admission of such evidence to show noncompliance with the terms of the ticket, since they constitute conditions subsequent, the breach of which must be separately pleaded.[23] In accordance with the general rules discussed in Negligence § 187 d (2), unless it appears that a general allegation is intended to cover other acts than those specially alleged, where there is an allegation of general negligence followed by allegations of specific negligence, the allegations of specific negligence supersede the allegation of general negligence,[24] and, if there is to be a recovery at all, it must be on the specific act or acts and not on the general allegation.[25] The fact that the evidence does not use the identical language of the complaint is not a material variance if from the evidence as a whole the jury may properly infer that the allegations are true.[26]

the management or operation of the vessel, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that defendant, at the time of the injuries, had such ownership or control of the vessel as would render him responsible.[28] Plaintiff cannot sustain his burden in this respect by a mere showing that defendant is a charterer of the vessel, since the primary presumption which attaches to such a showing is that the contract is simply one of affreightment, in which the general owners retain the control, management, and navigation of the vessel and the legal responsibility of ownership.[29] Furthermore the passenger has the burden of proving that there has been some negligence on the part of defendant,[30] which proximately caused the injury,[31] and, if the passenger fails to show that the accident happened as alleged, defendant is not bound to show the other ways in which the accident might have been caused.[32] Although the mere happening of an accident to the passenger is not proof of, or does not raise a presumption of, negligence on the part of the vessel,[33] and mere proof of injury to a passenger by causes not under the control of the carrier gives rise to no presumption of negligence on the part of the vessel,[34] if it is further shown that the injury resulted from something under the management or control of the vessel, and the circumstances are such that the injury could not well have happened without negligence on the part of defendant, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable,[35] which raises a presumption of negligence or makes out a prima facie case in favor of the passenger,[36] which throws on defendant the burden of showing that there was a full exercise of the care required under the circumstances.[37] Where a passenger shows that he has been assaulted by an employee of the vessel, the burden of proving any matter set up by way of justification or defense rests on defendant.[38]

Where the passage ticket stipulated that the contract was to be governed by the laws of a foreign country, it is for the vessel to show its nonliability thereunder,[39] and if such passengers are entitled to receive a lesser degree of care than those who travel on American ships, it is only fair to require a showing to that effect by the carrier when called on to respond to a tort claim.[40]

Contributory negligence. According to some authorities the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence is on the passenger,[41] but according to other authorities it is a defensive issue and the burden of proving it is on defendant.[42]

Statutory presumption. A statute providing that, in suits against steamship owners for injuries to person or property for injuries caused by the bursting of a boiler, the fact of bursting shall raise a presumption of negligence applies in a case where a passenger on one vessel is injured by the explosion of the boiler on another as well as where the person injured is a passenger on the vessel where the boiler explodes,[43] and casts on the owner of

Conclusiveness of presumption
The presumption of negligence, arising from the fact of the explosion of the boiler of a steamboat, becomes conclusive when no hidden defect is shown to have existed, and the boiler is found to have been in an unsafe condition resulting from burning, which must have been done by the carelessness of the engineer.

the vessel the burden of showing that the accident was due to causes which human skill and foresight in the construction and management could not foresee or avert.[44]

(2) Suits for Loss of, or Injury to, Baggage

Generally, proof of the delivery of the baggage to the vessel in good condition, and a failure of the latter to deliver it, or that there was a loss of, or injury to, the baggage when delivered to the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees.

In a suit for the loss of, or injury to, baggage the passenger has, in the first instance, the burden of proving the essential elements of his cause of action,[45] such as the delivery of the baggage to the vessel or its employees,[46] and the fact of the loss or injury.[47] However, where the passenger shows a delivery of the baggage to the vessel in good condition, and a failure of the latter to deliver it, or that there was a loss of, or injury to, the baggage when delivered to him, he establishes a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees which makes it incumbent on defendant to show freedom from negligence;[48] or, in cases where the liability is that of an insurer, that the loss or injury was the result of an act of God or inevitable accident,[49] and, although extraordinarily rough weather warrants a finding of damage to cargo or baggage by sea perils, provided proof of ordinary good stowage is first given by the ship, this preliminary burden is on the ship, and cannot rest in mere presumption.[50]

b. Admissibility

Competent, relevant, and material evidence is admissible in an action by a passenger against a carrier by water.

In an action by a passenger against a carrier by water, any evidence, if not otherwise incompetent, which is relevant and material is admissible,[51] while that which is irrelevant, immaterial, or incompetent is inadmissible.[52] Although a passage ticket issued to, and accepted by, the passenger is ordinarily admissible as showing the contract between the parties,[53] it is not the sole evidence of the contract of carriage,[54] and other evidence, such as representations in advertising circulars, and the like, may be introduced by the passenger to show what the contract really was;[55] but, where a ticket, collected by the vessel, has been lost, and the loss is not sufficiently accounted for, the carrier cannot impose on the passenger conditions and burdens contained in a form of contract offered in evidence and testified to as being the one generally used for trips such as those taken by plaintiff, since under such circumstances it will not be considered as the form of contract delivered to plaintiff.[56] Before a purported copy of a tariff schedule can be admitted in evidence, in order to prove that conditions and limitations contained therein form a part of the contract of carriage, there must first be competent evidence to show that the tariff schedule was properly filed.[57]

Admissions of the captain, as to the negligence of the steamship company or its employees in the construction or management of the vessel, are inadmissible as evidence against the steamship company, since the captain is employed only to navigate the vessel and such admissions are mere opinions outside the scope of his duty.[58]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions are usually controlling in actions by passengers against vessels or their owners.

The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions are usually controlling in actions by passengers against vessels or their owners.[59] Mere possession of a steamship ticket is not of itself sufficient evidence of an assignment by delivery to the holder.[60] An indorsement on an inspector's certificate that a vessel has supplied accommodations for an additional number of passengers cannot be accepted as sufficient evidence of that fact where other evidence shows conclusively that such accommodations were not provided.[61] Where a large number of passengers join in a suit in rem to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received as passengers from causes which are common to all, and which may be established by the same evidence in respect of the claim of each libelant, it is not essential, in order to sustain a decree in favor of each, that his damages should be separately proved, or that all should testify.[62]

Testimony of seafaring witnesses. On questions as to whether the wind was blowing a gale or only a strong breeze, or whether the ocean was very rough or otherwise, the testimony of a seafaring witness is not entitled to any greater weight than that of any other person who has reached years of discretion, and who has observed the sea in different kinds of weather.[63]

§ 201. —— Trial

In an action by a passenger against a carrier by water questions of fact should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

The general rules with respect to trials are applicable in actions brought by a passenger against a carrier by water.[64] Thus, questions of law are for the court, while questions of fact are for the jury.[65] In personal actions, whether there has been

Direction of verdict

(1) In river boat passenger's action for injuries sustained in falling off a deck chair, conflicting evidence as to cause of accident and the ab-negligence on the part of the vessel or its employees,[66] or contributory negligence on the part of the passenger,[67] is a question of fact for the jury, unless the evidence is so manifestly insufficient that a finding based thereon could not be sustained.[68] When it cannot be determined as a matter of law, the question of whether the injuries for which recovery is sought were proximately caused by the negligence or wrong of the vessel or its employees is ordinarily one for the jury.[69]

What constitutes baggage. Where recovery is sought for loss or injury of baggage, the question of whether any particular article or property may properly be deemed baggage, in view of the nature of the voyage, and the circumstances and condition of the passenger, is generally for the jury, under proper instructions from the court[70]

Instructions. Instructions, in actions by a passenger against a carrier by water, are governed by the rules applicable to instructions in civil actions generally.[71] Thus, on request, each party is ordinarily entitled to full instructions correctly stating the law covering his side of the case.[72] The instructions should deal only with the law, and the court should not charge the jury as to matters of fact.[73] Although requested, the court need not instruct on defenses not raised by defendant's answer,[74] or on matters which the evidence does not show to exist,[75] and, unless a requested instruction is entirely correct, and may properly be given without qualification or possibility of being misunderstood, there is no error in refusing it.[76] sence of evidence that boat owner failed to do anything it should have done in the exercise of ordinary care was held to justify directed verdict for owner—Cloke v Coney Island, 10 N.E 2d 1009, 56 Ohio App. 384.

(2) In action for injuries to passenger who stumbled over water guard, evidence showed that water guard was properly incidental to the construction of steamship and free from defects, and that passenger had full knowledge of its existence and location and could have seen water guard if he had looked, and hence verdict should have been directed for shipowner—Oliver v. New England S S Co, 52 N.E 2d 1, 315 Mass 151

(3) Under evidence in action for loss of trunk between Havre and Paris, ocean carrier selling New York-Havre steamship ticket was held to have entered into special contract for carrying passenger's trunk from New York to Paris as principal, not agent of connecting rail carrier, rendering directed verdict for ocean carrier erroneous—Wiener v Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, C C A N Y, 61 F.2d 893

§ 202. —— Damages; Recovery of Passage Money

a. Breach of contract or duty to transport
b Personal injuries
c. Delay, loss of, or injury to, baggage

a. Breach of Contract or Duty to Transport

Generally any failure of the carrier fully to perform its contract to transport entitles the passenger to recover any passage money which has been paid in advance. Where the failure to transport is due to inevitable accident or governmental action, the passage money is the only amount recoverable, but, if the breach consists in some voluntary act on the part of the carrier or its servants, items of damages which proximately result therefrom may be recovered.

While the rule applies only where the breach is of the precise contract for which the passage money has been paid,[77] unless the noncompletion of the transportation is due to the passenger's own conduct,[78] or the contract has liquidated the amount of damages recoverable,[79] practically any failure of the shipowner fully to perform his contract to transport entitles the passenger to recover any passage money that has been paid in advance,[80] even though the voyage is not completed because of destruction of the vessel by inevitable accident,[81] or not commenced because of acts of the government at the port of embarkation.[82] Where the failure to transport occurs at a foreign port of embarkation, the passenger is entitled to the return of his money at that port,[83] and, if suit for recovery is brought in this country, the rate of exchange has nothing to do with the matter, as the passenger has saved the exchange by coming to this country, and the recovery is of a sum representing in this country the amount which should have been returned to the passenger at the foreign port[84]

A moratorium or prohibition against withdrawal of bank accounts in the foreign country has been held to be no defense to an action in the United States to recover passage money which should have been refunded in the foreign port, if such prohibition does not render performance of the carrier's obligation impossible[85] Where the laws of a foreign country do not apply to a demand made in this country for a return of passage money, a recovery has been permitted notwithstanding restrictions in such foreign country requiring payment in local currency,[86] but, where all matters connected with performance of the contract of carriage are governed by the laws of a foreign country, a recovery of the passage money paid has been denied where the foreign law provides that a refund may be had only in a specific currency payable in the foreign country,[87] pursuant to a demand in the foreign

Release of currency from foreign restrictions

(1) Where performance of steamship company's contract to transport plaintiff from Germany to United States was prevented by Neutrality Act and presidential proclamation, plaintiff was entitled to refund of money deposited with company in Germany for such transportation only upon proof that company had succeeded in freeing deposited money from restrictions of German law providing for refund only in Germany.—Baer v U. S Lines Co., 43 N. Y S 2d 212, 180 Misc. 456.

(2) Plaintiff seeking refund of money deposited with steamship company in Germany in accordance with German law providing for refund in Germany only had burden of proving that company had transferred plaintiff's reichsmarks to United States in dollars, and proof of withdrawal of reichsmarks exchanged for dollars which were transferred to United States did not cast on com-

country,[88] and such a law has been held to apply to "on board money."[89]

Where passage money paid in foreign money is recoverable in an action therefor, the amount recoverable must be reckoned according to the value of the foreign money in the currency of the forum,[90] and it has been held that no recovery may be had where foreign money in question is worthless [91] The value of foreign money is to be reckoned at the rate of exchange prevailing on the day of the breach.[92]

Notice of claim. In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, provisions in the contract of carriage requiring a written notice of a claim for a refund to be given within a specified time after the voyage has been abandoned are valid and will be enforced.[93] However, since a contract of carriage is strictly construed against the carrier that prepared it, a provision of the contract requiring a written notice of claim within a specified time for damage in connection with the transportation is not applicable to an action by a passenger to recover the cost of passage where he failed to reach his destination,[94] although a provision of the contract of carriage requiring a written notice of claims under the ticket to be made within a specified time has been held applicable to an action to recover damages for the breach of the contract to carry where the voyage has been abandoned [95]

Other damages recoverable. If the failure to transport is due to inevitable accident or governmental action, and the vessel owner does all he can in performance of his contract, the passage money is the only amount recoverable, and no further sums can be had by way of damages.[96] If, however, the breach consists in some voluntary act on the part of the owner or his servants, and such damages proximately result therefrom, the passenger may recover compensation for loss of time,[97] expenses incurred in getting to the port of departure or port of destination,[98] and the expenses of living at an intermediate port[99] or the port of departure.[1] Likewise, a person who has come on board to transact business with a passenger, but is carried away without having been given an opportunity to go ashore, is entitled to damages amounting to the reasonable value of the time lost and expense incurred in being pany burden of proof or of going forward with proof that plaintiff's reichsmarks were not similarly withdrawn—Baer v. U S Lines Co, supra.

Expected reimbursement

Expectation that United States government would require Germany to reimburse steamship company for all its property confiscated by reason of war furnished no ground for requiring company to refund money deposited with it in Germany subject to German law providing that refund could only be made in Germany —Baer v. U. S Lines Co, supra.

Refund contract

Where refund of unused ticket agreed to by owner of vessel was to be made in Germany and was not completed because German authorities did not fully approve it, the passenger could not recover on the refund contract and was entitled only to restitution of the consideration given for such contract.—Bleiweiss v Cunard White Star Limited, 34 N Y.S 2d 172.

Foreign law held inapplicable

Where voyage from England to the United States was canceled by steamship company, German national who purchased steamship tickets in Germany with German money and who deposited "on board money" with the steamship company for use while on board steamship, was entitled to a refund of the on board money without having made any demand for the refund in Germany, since German law had no application —Spiegel v U. taken to, and returning from, the place at which he is finally put ashore.[2]

Damages may be recovered for sickness or physical injuries,[3] resulting losses and expenses,[4] and also any accompanying mental suffering,[5] where they are proximately caused by the vessel owner's breach of contract; but not where they are only remotely connected with the breach,[6] or where they are largely due to the passenger's own acts or want of care.[7] A passenger who has been wrongfully ejected,[8] or threatened with ejection unless he again pays his fare,[9] may recover damages for indignity or mental distress; but ordinarily no recovery can be had for mental suffering unaccompanied by physical injury or aggravating circumstances.[10] Discomfort, annoyance, or inconvenience is a proper subject of compensation for a breach in failing to furnish proper accommodations,[11] and in fixing the compensation for these elements it has been recognized that a distinction may properly be made because of sex.[12]

Special damages, resulting from peculiar circumstances, may be recovered where the carrier has been notified of such circumstances at the time the contract of carriage was entered into.[13]

Mitigating circumstances. In a suit by a passenger for wrongful ejection it may be shown in mitigation of damages that the passenger was guilty of misconduct on a former occasion,[14] and, if a passenger has been ejected because of humane motives, and to prevent him from coming to harm at the port of destination, the motives with which it is done mitigates the act and in such a case the damages must be small.[15]

Exemplary damages. If the master maliciously and wantonly keeps a person on board and carries him against his will, exemplary damages may be assessed against the master for his malicious conduct.[16]

Excessive damages. If the award made by a jury is so plainly excessive as to indicate that they were influenced by passion or prejudice, it may be set aside.[17]

b. Personal Injuries

Although there is authority to the contrary, it is generally held that, if the vessel owner has not authorized or ratified the act, he is not liable for exemplary damages where the passenger is injured by the malicious and wanton act of an employee.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[18] it is generally held that, if the vessel owner has not authorized or ratified the act, he is not liable for exemplary damages where a passenger is injured by the malicious and wanton act of an employee;[19] but a statute making the vessel liable for injuries done to passengers by officers of the vessel has been said to permit the recovery of punitive damages against the vessel.[20]

The principles governing compensatory damages for personal injuries are considered in Damages § 17 et seq, and the principles governing excessive or inadequate damages for personal injuries are considered in Damages § 198.

c. Delay, Loss of, or Injury to, Baggage

In the case of loss of baggage, the measure of damages is generally the actual value to the owner of the articles at the time of the loss. In the case of injury to personal property, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the property at the time of its delivery and its value after the damage in transit.

The measure of damages for loss of baggage is generally the actual value to the owner of the articles constituting the baggage at the time of the loss [21] If the articles lost are curios, having no market value in the generally accepted sense, their value at the port of destination as shown by the opinions of experts may be taken as the proper measure of damages.[22] Where the article consists of a manuscript having a great, but not readily ascertainable, value to the owner, it has been held that the amount of damages should properly be based on the amount of time it would take the author to reproduce the manuscript.[23] It has been held that the measure of damages for injury to personal property of the passenger is the difference between the market value of the property at the time of its delivery to the carrier by water and its value after the damage in transit [24]

Special damages may be recovered for the loss or delay of baggage where the vessel owner or his agent has been informed of the special circumstances;[25] but not otherwise, unless the circumstances are such as might reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties.[26]

X. DEMURRAGE

§ 203. Definitions and Distinctions

Demurrage is a sum agreed on to be paid as compensation for delay beyond a stipulated or reasonable time for loading or unloading a vessel; broadly, it is compensation recoverable for any improper detention.

Although demurrage has been said to be a mere name,[27] in its strict sense it is the compensation provided for in the contract of affreightment for the detention of the vessel beyond the time agreed on for loading or unloading;[28] a sum agreed by the charterer to be paid as liquidated damages for delay beyond a stipulated or reasonable time for loading or unloading.[29] Essentially demurrage is a claim for damages for failure to accept delivery [30] In a broad sense, every improper detention of a vessel may be considered a demurrage, and compensation in that name may be obtained for it.[31] It has been said that demurrage is only an extended freight or reward to the vessel as compensation for earnings she is improperly caused to lose,[32] and can only be allowed where the loss is proved.[33] Demurrage has reference solely to compensation for the services of the vessel, and not to compensation paid by the vessel to the custodian to whom the goods are delivered pending their delivery to consignee or owner.[34]

Ordinary demurrage is a claim by the vessel or the owner of the vessel against the charterer or the cargo, or a claim by the charterer against some person failing to perform a maritime duty to the vessel.[35]

are recoverable for breach of the implied obligation to load or unload with reasonable dispatch.

Liability for demurrage, using the word in its strictly technical sense, exists only when expressly stipulated for in the contract.[36] Using the term in its broader sense, damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable for a breach of the implied obligation to load or unload the cargo with reasonable dispatch,[37] but only by the party to whom the duty is owed,[38] and only against one who is party to the shipping contract, and who, under its terms, is responsible to the shipowner for the delay.[39] Where the shipping contract as executed omits the demurrage clauses,[40] or where it provides for recovery of demurrage for delay for a limited period, and the detention extends beyond the contract limit,[41] recovery of damages for wrongful detention, independently of express contract, may be allowed. Neither demurrage under the contract[42] nor damages for detention[43] are recoverable where the terms of the contract expressly negative such liability; but it has been held that a charter party expressly excluding demurrage and a telegraphic order from the charterer to the consignee to unload promptly on arrival constitute an implied agreement of the parties that reasonable diligence would be exerted for the discharge of the cargo entitling the shipowner to damages for any detention beyond a reasonable time.[44]

Execution and validity. When an express contract is relied on as defining a charterer's liability for demurrage or as exempting him from it, it is essential to its validity that it be executed,[45] and with the mutual assent of the parties,[46] based on knowledge of its terms;[47] and any modification thereof, to be binding, must be by mutual assent.[48] The contract must be based on a legally sufficient consideration;[49] and if made through agents, it must be shown that they were duly authorized, or that the contract has been ratified expressly or by implication by the party whom it is sought to hold bound.[50]

Construction and effect in general. The general rule that effect will be given to the intent of the parties, as expressed in the words they have used in their contract, applies to shipping contracts in determining whether demurrage has been provided for therein, and, if so, under what conditions or restrictions recovery may be had.[51] Even where the contract provides for demurrage, such provisions will not be extended by construction beyond the clear purport of the language employed,[52] provisions for reductions in freight in certain contingencies not applying to demurrage,[53] provisions for demurrage under express contract not applying necessarily to an implied contract arising after termination of the express contract by circumstances which rendered its performance impossible,[54] provisions exempting the charterer from liability for delay not due to his fault not relieving him from liability for detention caused by failure to perform his covenants,[55] and provisions exempting from liability for delay or failure to perform his covenants, not covering delay or failure due to the party's willful neglect or fault.[56] The intention of the parties to an informal charter party, with respect to demurrage, may be gathered from the terms of a formal charter for a series of similar voyages.[57]

Following the general rule of construction, words will be given their ordinary meaning[58] unless it appears from the context that a word has been used by the parties in a peculiar sense.[59] Inconsistent and conflicting clauses in a shipping contract must be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as collected from the whole instrument.[60] A bill of lading supersedes and takes precedence over a prior parol agreement as to the rate of discharge, on the principle that preliminary negotiations are merged in a written contract,[61] but a bill of lading is itself subject to the charter party where the provisions of both are in conflict.[62] A bill of lading providing for loading demurrage, issued after the vessel is loaded, relates back and governs the liability of the shipper for the delay caused by him in loading, in the absence of other provisions to the contrary.[63]

§ 205. Liability of Charterer

a. In general
b. Termination of liability

a. In General

The shipper or charterer is primarily liable for demurrage regardless of the existence or nonexistence of an express contract, but not for delays for which he is not responsible, or where the contract relieves him of liability.

The shipper or charterer is primarily liable for demurrage, regardless of the existence or nonexistence of an express contract,[64] and where the delay is with respect to matters for which responsibility is placed on, or assumed by, the charterer, the liability is his,[65] but he is not liable where the delay is due to default in performance of a duty which under the agreement rests on the ship[66] or on a third person,[67] or to marine risks which the shipowner assumed;[68] nor is he liable for loss from detention in discharging cargo, where the carrier has assumed the risk of delay.[69] The charterer may agree to load or discharge within a fixed time even though the risk and expense of at least a part of the operation may remain on the shipowner.[70] The liability of the charterer for delay caused by act of the shipmaster is established by proof that the master was acting therein as agent for the charterer,[71] while no such liability exists if the master was acting as agent of the consignee.[72] A charterer's liability cannot be based on a mere expression of opinion in a letter written by him,[73] or on a charter party which was canceled before the delay arose.[74] Where the charterer subcharters the vessel to others, the latter become charterers within the meaning of the rule imposing liability for demurrage on charterers,[75] and are liable for damages for detention of the vessel due to their fault.[76] A charterer is not relieved of liability by the circumstance that the consignee is the owner of the goods, and, as such, takes part in the negotiations with the shipper as to the rate of freight,[77] or by the fact that the chartered vessel for delay of which demurrage is claimed was owned by the charterer and lent by him for a money consideration to the plaintiff to use with his own vessels.[78]

b. Termination of Liability

Where the charterer is primarily liable for demurrage, his liability is not terminated when the goods are delivered on ship, or when the goods are delivered to, and accepted by, the consignee; but charter parties usually contain a "cesser clause" providing that the charterer's liability shall cease as soon as the cargo shall have been shipped.

Where the contract between charterer or shipper and the shipowner places the primary liability for demurrage on the charterer, that liability is not terminated when the goods are delivered on ship and the shipowner's lien attaches,[79] nor does it terminate even when the goods are delivered to the consignee and accepted by him, unless, and then only to the extent that, the charter party may provide for its termination.[80]

Cesser clause. A charter party commonly contains a stipulation known as a "cesser clause"[81] providing that the charterer's liability under the charter party shall cease as soon as the cargo shall have been shipped,[82] the general object of which is to free the charterer from responsibility at distant ports, arising from circumstances not within his control or subject to his supervision.[83] It is usually associated with a clause giving an absolute lien on the cargo in favor of the ship for freight and demurrage,[84] and the general construction of the two clauses together is to consider the intent of the parties to be that the ship shall look to her lien on the cargo for all claims arising after leaving the port of loading.[85] Where a charter party contains a clause for cesser of the liability of the charterer, coupled with a clause creating a lien in favor of the shipowner, the cesser clause is to be construed, if possible, as not applicable to a liability with which the lien is not commensurate,[86] such as a claim for demurrage which accrued before loading,[87] demurrage charges to which the consignee is not made liable by the bill of lading,[88] or demurrage charges at the point of unloading where the ship was required so to discharge the cargo that the lien was lost,[89] but where liens for demurrage charges commensurate with the rights surrendered by the cesser clause, are given to the shipowner, the charterer's liability for such charges ceases.[90] If the language exempting the charterer is clear and explicit, he will be protected even against claims for prior delays at the place of loading as well as for claims at the place of discharge.[91] If the meaning of the charter in connection with the cesser clause is not clear, the court will construe it as not relieving the charterer from his stipulated liability for breaches incurred in loading,[92] and the charterer's liability for delay in loading continues notwithstanding a cesser clause, where other clauses in the contract expressly provide for a division of liability between the charterer for delay at port of loading and the consignee at port of discharge,[93] or where the cesser clause is printed and the parties have inserted in writing a provision inconsistent therewith to the effect that the charterer will have the cargo discharged within a fixed period.[94] In order to terminate liability there must have been compliance with the conditions of the cesser clause.[95] A cesser clause terminating the charterer's liability does not release the ship from responsibility, which she had assumed, to unload according to the custom of the port.[96]

Effect of identity of parties. The fact that the charterer and consignee are the same person does not affect the operation of the rule exempting the charterer from all personal liability under the cesser clause when a lien on the cargo is substituted therefor.[97]

§ 206. Liability of Consignee or Assignee of Bill of Lading

a. In general
b. Incorporation of terms of charter party in bill of lading

a. In General

In the absence of a contract imposing such liability, the consignee or his assignee ordinarily is not liable for demurrage before he has accepted the cargo, and he is not liable for demurrage after he has accepted the cargo unless the delay is clearly due to his fault, or unless he is the owner of the cargo.

Acceptance by the consignee of a cargo delivered under a bill of lading containing stipulations as to demurrage imposes on him a liability for any demurrage accruing under those stipulations,[98] even though the cargo was to be delivered free of all charges, and the consignee was not bound to accept it until they were paid.[99] Liability for demurrage under the stipulations is also imposed on an assignee or indorsee of the bill,[1] and the charterer's exemption from liability under the cesser clause does not inure to the assignee's benefit;[2] but such liability for demurrage is not imposed on a common carrier to whom the goods are delivered by the ship for forwarding to the consignee.[3] The rule imposing liability, in the absence of express contract, applicable to the freighter or shipper, does not apply to the consignee or his assignee before acceptance of the cargo,[4] and not afterward, except where the delay is clearly due to his fault;[5] but there is no doubt of the applicability of the rule imposing liability in the absence of contract to the consignee or person accepting the goods, when he is the owner thereof,[6] unless he is not at fault for the delay,[7] or has transferred his title to the goods to someone else, and given notice of the transfer to the master of the ship.[8] The consignee under the terms of his contract with the charterer may be liable to the charterer for such sums as the latter was compelled to pay for demurrage for delay caused by the consignee.[9]

In some instances the consignee has been made liable to the shipowner by estoppel,[10] but not by agreeing to advance funds to his vendor to cover cost of material, freight, and haulage, where the charter party was signed by the vendor alone;[11] and a person who buys cargo on board ship after her arrival, taking no transfer of the bill of lading or charter party, and having no knowledge of either, is bound only to the use of reasonable diligence in discharging in conformity with the custom of the port.[12]

Where by acceptance of the cargo or otherwise the consignee's liability has attached, he cannot relieve himself therefrom by subcontracts to others

As between consignee and buyer
A sale by cargo consignee on "cost and freight" basis was not a maritime contract, and hence, in shipowner's suit against consignee and buyer for loading demurrage, breach of such contract could not be basis of right of contribution between consignee and buyer, since admiralty had no jurisdiction of contract—The Lake Galera, C C A N Y., 60 F.2d 876, certiorari denied Jamison v. who do not act directly under the bill of lading,[13] or by claiming that the cargo was ordered for an undisclosed principal,[14] or that other cargo was shipped by the same vessel to other consignees.[15]

b. Incorporation of Terms of Charter Party in Bill of Lading

The consignee, or the assignee of the bill of lading, may become liable for demurrage where provisions therefor in the charter party are properly incorporated in the bill of lading.

Provisions in the charter party relating to demurrage are binding on the consignee or on the assignee or indorsee of the bill of lading only when referred to, and adopted in, the bill of lading.[16] Such adoption is effected when the bill of lading specifically refers to provisions in a charter party in such manner that such provisions are made a part thereof.[17] The phrases "paying freight as per charter party,"[18] "he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter party, with primage and average accustomed,"[19] have been held to impose none of the stipulations of the charter party except such as pertain to the payment of freight, and not to render one who receives goods under the bill of lading liable for demurrage provided for in the charter.[20] A bill of lading, providing for the payment of freight and "all other conditions as per charter party" has been construed ejusdem generis as imposing on the consignee the payment of something more than freight, and including the obligation referred to in the charter party with respect to the rate of delivery and the payment of the demurrage specified, although not necessarily including an independent provision of the charter party relating to different subjects.[21] A fortiori, where a transaction is embodied in several bills of lading, and some of them impose liability for "freight and demurrage as provided in the charter party," and others state conditions of liability are to be as provided in charter party, liability for demurrage is imposed by the latter group on the consignee.[22] Exemption from contract liability for demurrage under the bill of lading does not exempt the consignee from liability for damages for detention resulting from his wrongful act.[23] The right to recover demurrage from the consignee and cargo receiver is not lost by failure to insist on a lien for demurrage where the charter provisions as to demurrage are incorporated in the bill of lading by reference.[24] A cesser clause creating a personal exemption in favor of the charterer is not made a part of the bill of lading by reference so as to give a consignee any rights thereunder.[25]

§ 207. Effect of Customs and Usages in General

The usage or custom of the port as to time for loading or unloading may become a part of the contract expressly or by implication.

The usage or custom of a port as to period allowed for loading or unloading a vessel is a part of the shipping contract and binding on the parties when expressly incorporated therein by reference,[26] or, when, in the absence of any express agreement controlling it, it becomes an implied term in whatever contract is made,[27] or has a bearing as evidence on the issue of negligence in loading or unloading in an action to recover damages for wrongful detention;[28] but where a contract in express terms provides its own rule of liability for demurrage, the contract rule prevails over any usage or custom of the port to the contrary.[29] Even where the contract expressly provides for loading or unloading according to the custom of the port, a specific contract provision allowing a certain number of days will prevail over a port custom to the contrary;[30] but specific provisions for loading or unloading may be construed as having been made with reference to customs or usages not inconsistent therewith, and as being qualified or modified thereby.[31]

§ 208. What Delay Creates Liability

What specific delays impose liability for demurrage or damages in the nature of demurrage are discussed infra §§ 209–212

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 209. —— In Loading

The charterer is liable for demurrage where he is responsible for delays in loading, either within the time specified by the contract, or within a reasonable time where the contract is silent on the subject.

Demurrage is recoverable for delay in loading the vessel,[32] subject to the terms of the shipping contract,[33] and to usages and conditions at particular ports which expressly or by implication are made a part of the shipping contract.[34] In the absence of a charter provision on the subject the loading must be accomplished with such reasonable promptitude as the situation and circumstances allow.[35] Thus, the right to recover exists where the delay is caused by the failure of the charterer to have the entire cargo ready for delivery at the port of loading,[36] and at a place convenient for loading directly into the ship,[37] by a variation in the character of cargo from that specified in the charter party,[38] by the failure of the charterer in his duty under the contract to provide the vessel a safe berth at which she can be loaded within a reasonable time,[39] by the failure of the charterer promptly to supply the requisite number of lighters to convey the cargo to the ship, where delivery by this means is contemplated;[40] or by delay in loading the cargo onto the vessel where the charter party places that duty on the charterer,[41] provisions that cargo should be loaded by the charterer into the ship yielding, however, to other provisions that it be delivered alongside within reach of the ship's tackles.[42] Under an agreement to furnish cargo as fast as the ship can receive it the charterer is not liable for delay where the nature of the cargo is such as to render a more rapid delivery impracticable.[43]

The charterer is not liable where the delay is caused by the vessel being compelled, without her fault, to wait her turn in loading according to the custom of the port,[44] but the rule is otherwise where provisions in the charter supersede the custom[45] or the act or default of the charterer prevents the ship loading in turn.[46]

Custom modified by contract

An agreement of owner in a charter party to load cargo according to custom of port is not governed by the custom of port as to time of loading, where the charter party allows a specified number of running lay days, Sundays, and holidays, even if used, excluded, for loading.—Holman v. binding so as to render the charterer or consignee accepting the cargo liable in damages for delay caused by noncompliance,[47] and although they will not be construed as contemplating impossible things,[48] or as penalizing the consignee unless the case comes clearly within their terms,[49] their effect cannot be changed by usage and custom,[50] unless such custom is expressly made a part of the contract,[51] and then only to the extent that the custom applies.[52] The custom must not be unreasonable.[53] Clauses which are in effect merely permissive are not binding, when not in fact observed.[54] A construction of the contract, which has been acted on by the parties and which is in itself reasonable, will be sustained by the courts.[55] Where delay in unloading caused no actual loss, there can be no recovery.[56]

(2) Dispatch

Breach of an express provision relating to dispatch in unloading will render the charterer or consignee liable where he fails to receive the cargo as fast as the vessel can deliver it. A provision for unloading, employing the term "customary dispatch" or an equivalent term contemplates usual, rather than quick dispatch; but the meaning and effect given to quick dispatch attaches to the term "customary quick dispatch."

The charterer is liable in damages for a breach of an express provision of the contract relating to dispatch in unloading the vessel, and the words "dispatch," "prompt dispatch," or "quick dispatch," or equivalent words obligate the charterer to receive the cargo as fast as the vessel can deliver it,[57] and they are not in any way controlled by the rules, usages, or customs of the port,[58] such as a custom that the vessel shall take her turn at the wharf,[59] although it has been held that dispatch at a particular port is dependent on facilities at that port for unloading vessels.[60]

Customary dispatch The expressions "customary dispatch," or "customary time," or "customary discharge" contemplate usual, rather than quick, dispatch, and a contract containing such a provision is fulfilled if the vessel is afforded the customary facilities for speedy discharge at the port of destination,[61] or at the substituted port, where a substitution is made,[62] or contemplate reasonable diligence in an extemporized port where there is no custom.[63] The phrases "customary dispatch" or "customary time" include the lawful, reasonable, and well-known customs of the port of discharge which have to do with discharge of cargoes,[64] but they do not do away with the obligation of the charterer to provide a berth where the vessel may be promptly discharged,[65] or to use reasonable diligence in unload-

Intention of parties
Where contract between shipping company and grain company provided that in case of delay in unloading, certain demurrage would be payable a designated number of hours after arrival of grain at port, honesty of both parties was presumed, and grain company was charged with knowledge of fact that limitation was intended to protect shipping company against loss of use of its boats after expiration of agreed unloading period —Sarnia Steamships v. Custom held unreasonable Custom relied on by charterers and purchasers of cargo of sugar, in libel for demurrage, that standard for discharge was seven hundred tons per weather working day was unreasonable, even though custom had never been in litigation before and was old along entire Atlantic seaboard, where custom at port was confined virtually to purchaser's plant, since current conditions require more expeditious stevedoring —The Hartismere, supra.

ing according to the terms of the charter party.[66] They do not include customs of the port which have their origin in the sale of cargoes,[67] or special usages of the charterer in his business as distinguished from the general customs of the port[68] The custom governing rate of discharge of a cargo applies to the vessel,[69] and the discharge cannot be accelerated over the customary rate by discharging the cargo into two or more lighters and claiming a right to discharge from each lighter at the vessel rate.[70] The word "customary" in such a provision relates not only to the method but also to the time of unloading[71]

Customary quick dispatch The meaning and effect given to "quick dispatch" attach to the term "customary quick dispatch"[72] as distinguished from the usual discharge[73] A provision for "quick dispatch as customary" has been construed to mean as quick dispatch as is customary at the port of delivery.[74]

(3) Providing Berth

A consignee on whom rests the duty under the contract to designate a berth for discharging is liable for failure or delay in providing a berth, or for any delay due to the fact that the wharf he selects is not suitable for the purpose.

Where by the terms of the charter party the charterer is to name the berth for discharging, he should be ready to receive the cargo when the vessel is ready to deliver,[75] even if she cannot do so because he has failed to name a berth,[76] or has named a berth to which she cannot get, or to which she is prevented from getting, through no fault of her own.[77] The consignee must designate a berth where such obligation is necessarily implied from other express provisions in the contract.[78] A consignee, on whom rests the duty under the contract to designate a berth, is liable for failure[79] or delay[80] in providing a berth, or in securing the necessary permit for the vessel to proceed to the wharf,[81] or for any delay due to the fact that the wharf which he selects is not suitable for the purpose,[82] or for delay arising from its crowded[83] or dangerous[84] condition, or from its being difficult to reach by the use of reasonable means,[85] or from following the directions of the consignee,[86] and a master may refuse a berth that is not suitable or safe for his vessel;[87] but the consignee may designate a single wharf or a specified berth at a large wharf,[88] and is not required to make more than one tender of a berth provided it is suitable.[89] Where the master takes the berth selected by the consignee, the consignee is liable for delay subsequently occurring if not due to the fault of the master.[90]

charge her within a reasonable time,[91] even though the contract contains no stipulation as to demurrage;[92] and the master of the vessel, whenever his request for discharge of the cargo is declined,[93] or whenever he is dissatisfied with the rate of discharge,[94] may give notice, claiming demurrage unless discharge is completed within a reasonable time thereafter, and the consignee becomes liable if he fails to comply. Liability for delay beyond a reasonable time rests on the vendee of the consignee of the cargo where he unreasonably delays unloading.[95] What constitutes a reasonable time varies with the facilities of the port for discharging and the circumstances of the case,[96] and when the shipment is to a person having special conveniences,[97] or no special conveniences for unloading,[98] that fact enters into the contract and is considered in determining the question of reasonableness. It follows that a reasonable rate of discharge may not be the same at all wharves,[99] as for example, where the wharves at a port are not all equally convenient for the discharge of every sort of cargo.[1] Although it has been frequently stated that the obligation is to discharge in a reasonable time according to the custom of the port,[2] or, in some cases, by the custom of the trade, where the obligation to discharge is imposed on consignee or his vendee,[3] this has been qualified in other cases which hold it to mean that under ordinary circumstances the customary time becomes the reasonable time,[4] but that this test will not be employed when the circumstances are extraordinary, as the court will, in all instances, consider all the facts and circumstances, ordinary and extraordinary, which have a legitimate bearing on the question of the reasonableness of the time occupied.[5] Where reasonable time follows the custom of the port, the custom must not only be established and reasonable, but also certain and definite.[6]

(2) Providing Berth

Generally it is the duty of the charterer or the consignee to designate and provide a suitable berth for unloading within a reasonable time after arrival of the vessel.

In the absence of proof of custom where the agreement provides for discharge according to the custom of the port,[7] and in the absence of a specific agreement or usage to the contrary, it is the duty of the charterer or consignee, as the case may be, to designate and provide a suitable wharf or berth for the vessel within a reasonable time after her arrival, and he is liable for delay resulting from failure to do so,[8] although there is authority for the view that where the contract is silent the owner of the ship assumes to know the harbor and takes the risk of finding suitable dockage, depth of water, and discharging facilities.[9] An exception to the general rule has been said to exist in the case of a general ship carrying a mixed cargo.[10] Where the charterer or consignee has designated the berth, it is the duty of the master of the vessel to proceed to the place designated;[11] but having once berthed in the place designated, the owner of the cargo, in the absence of an established usage to the contrary, cannot change the berth except by paying the cost of the change and demurrage for delay occasioned thereby,[12] nor can he then interrupt the unloading without being charged with the delay caused[13] After designating an available discharging berth, the charterer or consignee is not liable for delay caused by the crowded condition of the dock or by the vessel being compelled to wait its turn, especially when such waiting is required by the custom of the port,[14] nor can the shipowner add to his rights by notifying the consignee that the cargo must be discharged within a specific period;[15] but there is authority for the view that in such cases the charterer takes the risk of delay beyond a reasonable time.[16]

(3) Facilities for Discharge

Failure to furnish adequate facilities for prompt discharge may render the shipper or other contracting party liable for delay in unloading.

Where there is no specific agreement on the subject, and no known custom of the port to the contrary, it is the duty of the shipper or other contracting party to be not only ready to receive the cargo on notice of the arrival of the vessel, but to receive it as delivered from the vessel,[17] providing lighters if he chooses to have the cargo discharged in that way.[18] If, however, there is a more expeditious method of discharging the cargo available to him than into vessels, he must adopt the quicker method.[19] The shipper must exercise reasonable diligence in furnishing sufficient dockage room and means for transportation away from the dock so that the cargo will not accumulate in such a way as to impede the delivery,[20] and must conform to the customs and usages of the port, when not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter party or bill of lading.[21] When he does conform to the custom of the port under such circumstances, he is excused for any delay occasioned thereby.[22]

§ 211. —— Between Loading and Unloading

In a proper case demurrage is recoverable for detention or delay of a vessel after loading and before unloading: and loss of the vessel on the voyage does not affect the right to recover accrued demurrage.

It has been held that demurrage is recoverable for a detention of the vessel after loading and before unloading which is not due to the fault of the master,[23] as, for example, where the delay is occasioned by overloading,[24] or by an attachment of a part of the cargo and unloading the attached goods when the vessel was ready to sail,[25] or by suspension of the voyage by the consignee,[26] or by failure of the charterer to procure clearance papers[27] or an export license[28] unless the failure was due to no fault of his,[29] or by delay because of disputes over the bill of lading presented in which the master was right and the charterer was wrong,[30] or by delay in towing the vessel out to sea after it is loaded, where the contract provides for such towage by the charterer.[31] Demurrage is not recoverable for delays due to maritime risks which the owner or master of the vessel has assumed.[32] A provision for the payment of towage by the charterer does not obligate him to furnish a towboat so as to render him liable for delay in procuring towage.[33] Demurrage is not recoverable under a contract impliedly incorporating a custom between the parties which contemplated delay without payment of demurrage,[34] as, for example, chartering and loading vessels with grain late in the autumn, and having them lay up during the winter.[35] Under a contract of affreightment the shipper is not liable for delay due to obstructions to navigation between ports.[36]

Effect of loss of vessel on accrued demurrage. Where the vessel is lost on the voyage, the right to recover demurrage accrued before the disaster is not affected,[37] as, for example, demurrage for extra detention at an intermediate port which becomes absolutely due at such port.[38]

§ 212. —— Subsequent to Unloading

Completion of unloading terminates the liability of the consignee for demurrage.

On completion of the unloading, the liability of the consignee for demurrage terminates, and he is not responsible for any subsequent detention of the vessel.[39]

§ 213. Acts of Persons Other than Charterer

The liability of the charterer for acts of other persons which cause delay is discussed infra §§ 214, 215.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 214. —— Master and Shipowner

The charterer is not liable for delay caused by the wrongful, negligent, or unreasonable acts of the owner or master of the vessel or their agents.

The charterer is not liable for delay due to the wrongful, negligent, or unreasonable acts of the owner or master of the vessel, or any of their agents,[40] and this rule has been applied in cases presenting a variety of circumstances, including cases of delay caused by failure of the vessel to arrive on scheduled time[41] or to follow the direct route;[42] failure of the master to have the vessel in readiness to receive or discharge the cargo,[43] or to accept the towage offered;[44] an unjustified refusal to permit the consignee to unload;[45] refusal to berth at a suitable wharf selected by the charterer,[46] or delay in getting into the berth after it has been properly pointed out,[47] or delay after taking the berth in loading a cargo, ready to be loaded, and of such a nature that it could be loaded within the lay days,[48] or delay after taking the berth from failure to use the facilities available for unloading,[49] or to have sufficient equipment,[50] or to employ enough[51] or sufficiently competent[52] men to unload at the rate provided in the charter party; delay in requesting removal of a ship to facilitate loading;[53] errors of judgment in navigation;[54] negotiations entered into and disputes fostered by the master or shipowner,[55] such as an improper refusal to sign bills of lading;[56] or an improper demand for payment of freight charges and demurrage before discharge of the cargo,[57] or disagreement over selection of a stevedore where the charter party requires selection of one satisfactory to both parties;[58] and the absence of the master from the vessel while it was unloading.[59]

§ 215. —— Third Persons

Charterers may be liable for delays caused by acts of third persons under their control, but not otherwise. The liability of a charterer or consignee for delay due to strikes generally depends on whether the contract contains an exception for delay due to such cause.

With respect to other persons, it may be stated generally that the charterers are liable for delay caused by the acts or omissions of third persons within their control, such as agents,[60] but they are not liable where such third persons are not within their control.[61]

Where the contract contains no exception for delay caused by strikes, a strike among the laborers usually employed to load or unload the ship does not excuse the delay resulting therefrom under an express contract for the loading or unloading of the ship within a specified number of days,[62] or where, in the absence of express stipulations as to time in unloading, a reasonable time is allowed.[63] However, an exception of delay caused by strikes is frequently incorporated in the demurrage clause of the contract, and, in such cases, the delay is excused when entirely attributable to a strike,[64] but not when the strike is only the remote cause.[65] The charterer is not deprived of his excuse by the fact that at the time the agreement was made the strike was in existence and he knew it, provided the master also knew it and proceeded to the berth without objection,[66] but he cannot excuse the delay where he could have arranged for the discharge of the cargo notwithstanding the strike.[67]

§ 216. Act of God or Vis Major

Whether the charterer or consignee is or is not liable for delay caused by act of God or vis major depends largely on the terms of the contract.

The rule is well established that where the freighter or charterer agrees absolutely to load or unload the ship within a specified number of days, the fact that subsequent events, such as natural causes or governmental restraints, render performance impossible, is immaterial;[68] but that where no time is mentioned in the contract, or where the contract provides in general terms against liability of the charterer for delay not due to his default, delay is excused when caused by political or naval disturbances,[69] bad weather,[70] fire,[71] an epidemic or quarantine,[72] or other causes beyond his control.[73] There is no liability when the cause of the delay is one of the natural causes or vis major expressly excepted by the terms of the charter party;[74] but the application of the rule is conditioned on the cause of the delay being within the terms of the exception,[75] and on its being the proximate cause of the delay.[76] Where the charterer knew the danger at the time the agreement was made and failed to provide therein against it, he will be taken to have assumed the risk of delay from such sources,[77] and, a fortiori, where, in case of known danger, the agreement in express terms provides for charterer's liability in case of detention caused thereby, the charterer becomes liable for such delay.[78] A charter provision that delay by reason of

Exception in demurrage clause
(1) The general strike exception clause in a charter party does not prevent the running of demurrage, but a similar phrase is necessary in conjunction with demurrage clause to free charterer from burden of paying demurrage when delay is due to strikes.—Continental Grain Co. v. Armour Fertilizer Works, supra.

(2) Under charter party stipulating demurrage only for detention by default, charterer may be liable for demurrage, even though detention was due to a strike or other cause for which he was not at fault, since "default" means failure to perform whatever charterer was bound to do without regard to how the failure came about, subject only to vis major doctrine.—Continental Grain Co. v Armour Fertilizer Works, supra.

natural causes shall be excused does not apply to natural causes which merely prevent the cargo being brought to the port of shipment, but do not prevent its being loaded on the ship;[79] although the contrary has been held in a few cases where, by usage and necessity, the cargo was transported by rail or water to the place of loading.[80] Likewise, the owner of the vessel must bear the loss consequent on a delay of the vessel caused by natural causes before she reaches the wharf or other designated place for loading or unloading, and before the obligation of the charterer begins,[81] unless the vessel delays reaching the designated place for unloading at the request of the consignee.[82]

§ 217. Lay Days

a. In general
b. Commencement
c. Computation

a. In General

Generally charter parties stipulate for a certain number of days, called "lay days," during which the ship may be detained for loading or unloading without liability for demurrage.

The purpose of stipulating in the charter party for a certain number of days, called "lay days," for loading and discharging, is to allow the charterer that length of time during which he may detain the ship without paying for her use, and to make him liable for any detention thereafter.[83] In the absence of contract provision to the contrary, the lapse of the lay day period without the charterer furnishing cargo as agreed does not operate as a termination of the contract, but the ship must wait for the cargo a reasonable time thereafter, and for such time is entitled to demurrage in compensation[84]

Modification of lay days clause. In a proper case the lay days clause may be modified by the parties.[85]

b. Commencement

(1) In general
(2) Notice

(1) In General

The time when lay days commence may be controlled by the contract, or by the conduct of the parties or the custom of the port; and, in the absence of a contract or custom to the contrary, do not begin to run until the vessel is in actual readiness to load or unload.

Where the contract is express as to the time the lay days are to commence, it controls,[86] even though in other details the contract may be subsequently modified,[87] or the loading or discharging may actually begin before the stipulated time.[88] Where the contract does not expressly fix the commencement of the lay days, it may be fixed by the conduct of the parties,[89] or, in the absence of agreement or of any provisions therein conflicting with the custom, by the custom of the port.[90] In the absence of any conflicting custom or contract provisions, the lay days do not begin to run until the vessel is in actual readiness to load or discharge,[91] and, where it is provided that the vessel shall proceed to a certain specified wharf or jetty, or one to be selected by the charterer, the arrival of the ship at that wharf or jetty is a condition precedent to the commencement of the running of the time,[92] even though it subjects the vessel to an unreasonable delay in waiting for its turn.[93] If the charterer or consignee, under duty to designate a berth, fails to do so, the lay days commence when the vessel is in readiness to discharge and has given notice thereof,[94] and, if the vessel is prevented from reaching the designated place through the active fault of the charterer, the days begin to count at the time she would have reached it, but for such fault;[95] but after the vessel gets into the dock, the fact that the crowded condition prevents her securing a fit place for discharging the cargo does not prevent the lay days from running.[96]

(2) Notice

Ordinarily notice of readiness to load or discharge must be given before the lay days commence to run.

Ordinarily, in addition to the ship proceeding to the place assigned, she must give formal notice of her readiness to proceed to an appropriate unloading place before her laying time begins,[97] but notice is unnecessary where the charterer is ready and the work begins at once,[98] or where the ship is chartered also for a homeward cargo, and the consignee after discharge of the outward cargo knows that the ship is ready to receive the homeward cargo,[99] or where the terms of the contract do not require it.[1] Where the contract of the parties so provides, notice of readiness to load is a condition precedent to any claim for demurrage.[2] Where it is needed, the notice, in order to be effective, must reach the shipper,[3] on a proper day,[4] but it need not be in any particular form.[5] In case of conflict between the charter party and the bill of lading as to who shall be given notice, the provisions of the charter party controls as between the shipowner and the charterer.[6] The notice becomes effective on lapse of the time named in the contract,[7] including Sundays and holidays,[8] or a reasonable time after it has been given,[9] but not until the ship is in actual readiness to proceed to an appropriate unloading place.[10]

c. Computation

(1) In general
(2) On basis of amount of cargo
(3) Separate computation for loading and unloading

(1) In General

The method of computing lay days is subject to control of contract provisions relative thereto, and generally whole days only are considered in the computation.

The method of computing lay days is subject to control of contract provisions relative thereto.[11] Where the contract simply mentions "days" or "running days"[12] and there is no custom to the contrary, all running or successive days are to be counted,[13] unless the contract excepts Sundays and holidays;[14] but where the phrase "working days" is used, all calendar days on which the law permits work to be done are intended. This excludes Sundays and legal holidays,[15] and excludes also days when work is prevented by order of the port authorities,[16] but not days occupied with tasks which it was the duty of the charterer under the charter party to perform,[17] or days subject to interruptions or accidents with respect to which the charterer assumed the risk,[18] or stormy days,[19] unless the expression "weather working days" is used.[20]

Lay days run continuously, in the absence of fault of the shipowner.[21] Days lost in loading or unloading for reasons beyond the charterer's control and within the terms of the exception clause are excluded,[22] but the exception clause will not be extended in its application beyond the terms of the contract provision which stipulates the kind of cargo to be carried.[23] In general, whole days only, and not hours or fractions of days, are considered in the computation,[24] but where the charter provides for a pro rata computation of demurrage and dispatch money for every part of a day it is to be calculated by hours and minutes.[25] Lay days may not be increased by misleading statements of the shipmaster as to the time which would be claimed for demurrage.[26]

(2) On Basis of Amount of Cargo

Where the contract so provides, lay days are computed on the basis of the loading or unloading of a stated amount of cargo each day.

Where the contract requires loading or unloading of a stated amount of cargo each day, the computation of lay days is made on that basis,[27] and working days only are counted, and Sundays and holidays are excluded.[28] Under such contracts, the lay days are computed on the amount of cargo actually loaded and stowed, and not that furnished to the vessel,[29] but, where the cargo is lumber, and a deduction in freight is made for that part of it which is dressed, a proportionately greater amount of it is required to be discharged during a day.[30] Provisions for lay days computed at a stated rate of discharge yield to other provisions requiring discharge of the vessel in turn and penalizing a violation by demurrage based on a required discharge at double the lay day rate for every day of wrongful delay.[31] Under some charter provisions and customs of the port demurrage may be computed on a working day of twenty-four working hours and a fewer number of hours worked will be counted as fractional parts of a day.[32]

(3) Separate Computation for Loading and Unloading

Unless otherwise provided by contract, lay days for loading and for unloading are computed separately.

The lay days for loading and discharging are considered separately, and not together,[33] unless the contract stipulates otherwise;[34] but, where a ship is unloaded at different ports, a loss of time at one port may be offset against a saving at another.[35]

§ 218. Waiver and Indemnity

Provisions for demurrage may be waived. One who is compelled to pay demurrage may recover it from the person primarily liable.

The provisions of the contract relating to demurrage or the right to demurrage after it has accrued may be waived,[36] and waiver by the master is effective to bind the ship.[37] Waiver can be established only on clear evidence.[38]

Indemnity. A person compelled to pay demurrage may recover it from the person primarily liable,[39] but only on clear proof that such demurrage has been or must be paid[40] and that responsibility therefor rests on the person from whom indemnity is sought;[41] and such person so primarily liable cannot escape liability by offering a release proved by the evidence to have been obtained from the master by duress.[42] A master can properly discontinue unloading until security for demurrage is given, only on giving timely notice to the charterer.[43] Where a bond to secure payment of demurrage is properly agreed to on a sufficient consideration, liability thereon is not affected by the fact that the bond is not signed until after the cargo is discharged.[44] Liability for interest under such bond is determinable by the law of the state where the bond was made and performable.[45]

§ 219. Collection of Claim

Questions relating to the collection of claims for demurrage, including the rate and amount, settlement, and actions for recovery are discussed infra §§ 220-222.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 220. —— Rate and Amount

a. Measure of damages
b. Computation of time

a. Measure of Damages

All damages for demurrage or in the nature of demurrage which a shipowner naturally and necessarily sustains by default of the shipper may be recovered; but the rate and amount of recovery may be controlled by stipulations in the contract.

All damages for demurrage or in the nature of demurrage which a shipowner naturally and necessarily sustains by the default of the shipper may be recovered;[46] but this recovery is limited to compensation for delays the risk of which are assumed by the charterer under the terms of his contract,[47] and is subject to deductions for delay resulting from the vessel's default,[48] or for failure of the vessel to take such measures as were reasonably available to mitigate the loss.[49] As a general rule, courts of admiralty have allowed the demurrage stipulated in contracts of charter party and bills of lading, except in cases where the loss of the shipowner has been shown to be less[50] or greater because extending beyond the demurrage period named in the contract,[51] in which case compensation for the further time is prima facie at the stipulated rate,[52] but gives way to an increased rate on evidence establishing that the earning capacity of the vessel is greater than it was figured at for the contract demurrage period.[53] Where the contract provides for demurrage at a specified rate for delay in unloading, the rate applies to each of several vessels delayed where each shipload was regarded as a cargo.[54]

Where no rate is stipulated,[55] or where the suit is to recover demurrage, not in a case where a cargo has been carried but where the charterer breached his contract by not supplying a cargo,[56] the amount recoverable is to be ascertained by the commissioner or by a jury on consideration of all the circumstances and of the real injury sustained by the shipowner. It has been held that, where there is an agreed rate of demurrage for vessels of that class, such rate controls,[57] unless the amount stipulated is in the nature of a penalty, and not liquidated damages.[58] Where there is no agreed rate, the shipowner is prima facie entitled to recover the probable net earnings of the vessel during the period of undue detention,[59] or gross earnings where it is shown that the expenses of the ship could not be decreased during the period of delay,[60] or where additions to, or deductions from, gross earnings are made for any difference in her expenses during the time of such delay.[61] A harbor rule regulating the rate of demurrage in cases where no rate is agreed on is not applicable where action is brought to recover damages for detention in the nature of demurrage.[62] Demurrage may include compensation of an interpreter at a foreign port,[63] cost of cablegrams to the shipper and consignee as to disputed matter,[64] the master's board bill during the delay at the port,[65] and protest fees[66] Purely speculative damages are not recoverable.[67] Interest is recoverable when the amount of demurrage is liquidated by contract.[68]

A demurrage rate stipulated in the charter party, while binding on the charterer, is not binding on the subcharterer[69] or consignee who accepts the cargo under a bill of lading without knowledge of the charter party, and under circumstances not charging him with knowledge thereof.[70]

b. Computation of Time

Demurrage commences to run after the expiration of the time allowed by contract for loading or unloading, or after a reasonable time where the contract is silent on the matter, and is recoverable for every day of detention thereafter.

Demurrage commences to run after the expiration of the time allowed by the contract for detention or for the purpose of loading or unloading, or, where there is no time specified, after the expiration of a reasonable time,[71] and is recoverable for every day of detention thereafter, with no exception of rainy days or Sundays,[72] unless such days fall within the period allowed for loading or unloading, in which case that period is extended and the demurrage period reduced pro tanto,[73] and in some cases it has been held that working days only are contemplated.[74] In computing the time, twenty-four hours are to be considered as a day,[75] and allowance of a full day's demurrage for detention of a ship during a substantial fraction of a day is proper[76] After demurrage has commenced to run, it will not be suspended by the occurrence of an event within the exceptions of the loading clause, so that a loss resulting from any such event, if it occurs after demurrage has commenced to run, falls on the charterer and not on the shipowner.[77] Delay at the port of call will not be counted in computation of demurrage, unless and until exhaustion of lay days at the port of destination.[78] Where the charter party does not limit the number of days a ship may be kept on demurrage, demurrage will run for a period that is reasonable under the circumstances.[79]

§ 221. —— Settlement

Claims for demurrage may in a proper case be settled by the parties or their agents.

Settlements made by the master will generally be held to be conclusive as to the owners,[80] especially where it is shown that the charterer and the shipowner ratified the settlement made between the charterer's agent and the master of the ship;[81] but negotiations on another matter not involving the claim for demurrage will not have the effect of releasing such claim.[82] Payment under protest of demurrage charges claimed by the master after the cargo is on board is a payment under duress justifying action by the charterer to recover it back.[83]

Commission. Where the charter party provides that the charterer's agent shall attend to the ship's business at a foreign port on the customary terms, the collection of demurrage by him at the instance of the shipowner entitles the agent to the customary commission for such service at that port.[84]

§ 222. —— Actions

Claims for demurrage may be enforced by actions in personam, or by actions in rem where a lien exists.

Claims for demurrage and for damages in the nature of demurrage are enforceable by actions in personam[85] or, where a lien exists, by actions in rem.[86] Where liability is created by express contract, suit should be brought on the contract, and general assumpsit will lie,[87] and, where the action is for damages in the nature of demurrage, special assumpsit or other form of action in which the implied promise is specially pleaded is proper and necessary.[88] An action on a bill of lading for demurrage is an action on a contract within the meaning of a statute regulating the trial of actions on contracts[89]

Defenses and objections. Questions between the government shipowner and its operating agent, which in no way affect its readiness for service under the charter party, cannot be raised by the charterer as a defense to an action by the government for demurrage.[90] Where loss from delay has accrued, an action to recover therefor is not prematurely brought because the evidence of loss is not in possession of plaintiff at the time.[91] Delay in bringing the action is no defense if within the statutory limitation of time;[92] nor does delay constitute laches, where the claim was seasonably made, the rights of defendant were not prejudiced, and the delay was justified by circumstances.[93] Dispatch money due a charterer cannot be offset by a consignee against a claim for demurrage.[94]

Parties. Although, when the vessel is let on shares, the master is pro hac vice owner and entitled to sue,[95] the libel is properly filed in the name of the shipowner.[96]

Pleading. The complaint, declaration, or libel should state a cause of action in contract,[97] but should not include a statement of evidentiary matters.[98]

Evidence. Although libelant is entitled to the presumption that the judgment of the master as to the anchorage of the vessel during the loading was properly exercised,[99] the burden is on him to show facts which determine when lay days begin to run,[1] and the default of respondent in detaining the vessel beyond the time specified in the charter party or, where no time is specified, beyond the customary and reasonable time;[2] but when such detention is shown, it devolves on respondent to prove the vessel's responsibility,[3] or the circumstances which excuse the charterer or consignee from responsibility therefor;[4] and evidence of the circumstances excusing the delay is admissible;[5] but evidence is not admissible to establish facts which under the terms of the particular contract would not excuse the delay.[6] In order to be entitled to recover, plaintiff or libelant must prove not only undue detention of the vessel, but also damage ensuing therefrom,[7] and to do this, he must present evidence of sufficient weight to establish both propositions.[8] Similarly, respondent having the burden of showing excuse from liability must do so by sufficient evidence.[9] Where there is ambiguity in the contract all material evidence is admissible to determine the reasonable meaning of the language as used and intended by the parties.[10]

Questions of fact. The question of whether there has been an unreasonable delay in loading or discharging is a question of fact.[11]

§ 223. Lien

The owner of a vessel has a maritime lien for demurrage on the cargo, enforceable in admiralty

It is well settled in the United States that the vessel owner has a maritime lien for demurrage on the cargo of a person responsible for a detention, enforceable in admiralty, regardless of the existence or nonexistence of an express contract for a lien or even for demurrage.[12] Such lien arises when the cargo is on board,[13] but not until then, and, in the absence of contract therefor, it does not cover demurrage incurred in loading,[14] and a cesser clause inapplicable to the loading demurrage will not operate to extend the lien thereto.[15] A contract giving the vessel a lien "for all freight, and demurrage," gives a lien for demurrage at either the port of loading or discharge.[16] This lien is lost by an unconditional delivery of the cargo to the claimant thereof,[17] but not by a discharge, accompanied by a claim of lien.[18]

XI. GENERAL AVERAGE

§ 224. Definition, Origin, Nature, and Elements

a. In general

b. Common adventure and peril, voluntary sacrifice or expenditure, and attainment of purpose

a. In General

General average is a contribution by the several interests engaged in a maritime adventure to make good the loss of one of them for voluntary sacrifices of the ship or cargo to save the residue of the property or the lives of those on board from a common, impending peril, or for extraordinary sacrifices, expenses, or services necessarily incurred for the common benefit and safety of all.

General average is a contribution by the several interests engaged in a maritime adventure to make good the loss of one of them for voluntary sacrifices of the ship or cargo,[19] in whole[20] or in part,[21] to save the residue of the property[22] or the lives of those on board[23] from a common[24] impending or imminent[25] peril, or for extraordinary[26] sacrifices,[27] expenses,[28] or services[29] necessarily incurred for the common benefit and safety of all the interests in the adventure.

The principle of contribution in general average is older than the common law [30] It is derived from the Rhodian law,[31] was adopted into the Roman jurisprudence, and thence entered into the general maritime law.[32] The rule appears to have been adopted into English law without the intervention of any statute.[33] It applies only to shipping,[34] and relates to contributions for losses, not distribution of profits.[35] Some authorities assert that it arises out of participation in a common venture, as discussed infra subsection b of this section, and depends on natural justice and an equity arising out of the relationship of the parties,[36] and not on the contract of carriage, as discussed infra § 231, while others hold, as also discussed infra § 231, that it arises out of the contract of affreightment, and that the obligation to contribute is implied by law.

The right to contribution rests on the principle that whatever is sacrificed for the common safety of the associated interests shall be made good by all the interests which were exposed to the common peril, and were saved from the common danger by the sacrifice.[37] The spirit and intendment of the law of contribution in general average are to place the persons interested, as near as may be, in the same relative position which they occupied before the peril was met,[38] and this object necessarily involves reciprocity of obligation and right,[39] with some exceptions,[40] as in the case of passengers' baggage, or jettison of deck cargo, as discussed infra § 228.

b. Common Adventure and Peril, Voluntary Sacrifice or Expenditure, and Attainment of Purpose

Liability in general average arises from participation in the common venture, and the principle is inapplicable between mere strangers. The three leading elements requisite to a case for general average contribution are that a condition of imminent peril, common to the ship and cargo, existed; that a voluntary sacrifice of property or an extraordinary expenditure to avert the general peril has been made; and that by that sacrifice or expense the safety of the other property has been secured.

Liability in general average arises from participation in the common venture.[41] The principle is inapplicable between mere strangers,[42] and is not applied except as between those engaged in a common maritime adventure.[43] A tug towing barges from one port to another is not bound up with them into a single maritime adventure, so as to be subject to the law of general average [44]

The three leading elements recognized and enforced by the Roman law as limitations and conditions requisite to a case for general average contribution, and since steadily adhered to by maritime nations,[45] are that a condition of imminent peril, common to the ship and the cargo, existed;[46] that a voluntary sacrifice of property[47] or an extraordinary expenditure to avert the general peril[48] has been made, or, stated differently, that there has been a deliberate[49] or intentional[50] sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo; and that by that sacrifice or expense the safety of the other property has been secured.[51] The expense or consequence of an act or of a series of acts, or the loss occasioned by such acts, for the benefit of the ship alone,[52] or for the benefit of the cargo alone,[53] is not to be contributed for in general average. The acts must be for the common good.[54]

§ 225. Ordering General Average Act

a. Authority to order
b. Exercise of judgment

a. Authority to Order

A loss which gives rise to contribution in general average must have resulted from the will and act of the master or person in charge of the common adventure, and when such person determines on the general average act he is the agent for all parties interested.

A loss which gives rise to contribution in general average must have resulted from the will and act of the master of the ship, or of some other person charged with the control and protection of the common adventure,[55] and not from the act of a stranger,[56] whether private[57] or public,[58] unless such act is sanctioned[59] or participated in[60] by a person in charge of the vessel or cargo. When such person determines on the general average act, he is the agent for all parties interested;[61] his authority rests on the implied contract of the parties or on the duty imposed on him by law, as incident to his station and office, to meet the necessity created by the emergency,[62] or on the provisions contained in the bill of lading or contract of carriage.[63] A master ordering a general average act is under a duty to exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain its effects,[64] and, if due diligence would have disclosed its effects and shown damage or expense giving rise to a right to contribution, he is under a duty, as discussed infra § 233, to protect the interests entitled to such right.

b. Exercise of Judgment

With respect to ordering a general average act, ordinarily the course to be pursued rests in the master's sound discretion.

Ordinarily the course to be pursued rests in the master's sound discretion,[65] if he is a competent master, and an emergency existed calling for a decision whether a sacrifice was required, and if he appears to have arrived at his conclusion with due deliberation, by a fair exercise of his own skill and judgment, with no unreasonable timidity, and with an honest intent to do his duty, it is presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that his decision was wisely and properly made.[66] There may be a choice of perils when there is no possibility of perfect safety,[67] or where inevitable danger is impending but may be met with different degrees of peril to life or property.[68] Consultation is demonstrative proof that the act was voluntary.[69] If it sufficiently appears that the act occasioning the loss was the result of reasonably sound judgment, it is enough, for in time of imminent danger immediate action may be necessary and delay may render consultation impracticable.[70]

§ 226. Perils, Acts, and Losses Giving Rise to General Average

a. In general
b. Unseaworthiness
c. Condition of, and particular danger to, property sacrificed

a. In General

All losses which arise in consequence of sacrifices made or extraordinary expense incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo from imminent common peril during the voyage constitute charges in general average.

All losses which arise in consequence of sacrifices made or extraordinary expense incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo from imminent common peril during the voyage constitute charges in general average,[71] and must be borne proportionately by all the interests which are benefited by them.[72] Sacrifices are often made in specie, as by casting overboard a part of the ship or of her cargo, or by voluntarily stranding both ship and cargo.[73] The payment by any party in interest of extraordinary expenses, or the appropriation of the ship's appliances to extraordinary use for the safety of the imperiled interests, is equally to be regarded and treated as sacrifices as discussed infra § 228. The danger encountered by the election of the master may be either of a different kind from the danger avoided, or of the same kind, but it must not be the very same danger, merely modified by acts of the master in the performance of his ordinary duty in the navigation or management of the vessel, so as to diminish its effects.[74] The question with respect to general average is not what was the extent of the danger, supposing the sacrifice to have been made, but what would the danger have been if the sacrifice had not been made.[75]

Imminence of peril. While the courts in some general average cases have used expressions indicating that it is essential that the property at risk be subject to an immediately impending danger, as discussed supra § 224, it has been held that the imminency of the peril is not the critical test,[76] and that if the danger be real and substantial, a sacrifice or expenditure made in good faith for the common interest is justified, even though the advent of any catastrophe may be distant or indeed unlikely.[77]

b. Unseaworthiness

In the absence of some reservation of the right, a ship or shipowner cannot maintain a claim for contribution as to sacrifices or expenses which result from the unseaworthiness of the vessel, and seaworthiness is determined when the ship breaks ground and is measured by fitness in all respects to fulfill the purposes of the voyage as then contemplated.

In the absence of some reservation of the right, as discussed infra § 232, a ship or a shipowner cannot maintain a claim for contribution as to sacrifices or expenses which result from the unseaworthiness of the vessel,[78] especially where the defects which caused the unseaworthiness were discoverable by due diligence.[79] Indeed, it has been held that there can be no recovery even though the defects which caused the unseaworthiness were not discoverable by due diligence,[80] and even though the ship or the shipowner has excused herself or himself from liability for breach of the contract of carriage, as discussed infra § 232. In this connection, "seaworthiness" is determined when the ship breaks ground[81] and is measured by her fitness in all respects to fulfill the purposes of the voyage as then contemplated,[82] and depends on the facts and circumstances in each particular case.[83] Thus, if the ship is unseaworthy at the inception of the voyage, the shipowner is not entitled to contribution in general average because of sacrifices or expenses made necessary by reason of such condition when she encounters the perils of the sea;[84] it is his duty to have the ship seaworthy when she breaks ground for the voyage, as discussed supra § 140, and expenses arising from a breach of that duty, although made necessary by some harbor peril causing damage in loading, cannot be made a general average charge against the cargo.[85] It has been held, however, that unseaworthiness does not relieve the cargo from the duty to contribute to sacrifices which do not arise because of the unseaworthiness.[86]

c. Condition of, and Particular Danger to, Property Sacrificed

In order to justify an allowance in general average, it does not make any difference that the danger was greatest to the property cast away, and the right to contribution is denied only in those circumstances in which the property sacrificed must inevitably, or at least in all reasonable probability, have been lost.

In order to justify an allowance in general average, it is not necessary that the particular property sacrificed should have been exposed to greater danger by encountering the loss than it would otherwise have been,[87] nor does it make any difference that the danger was greatest to the property cast away.[88] There is authority for the rule that, where, were it not for the voluntary destruction of part, the whole would certainly and unavoidably have been lost, no claim for contribution can be sustained,[89] but if there is a possibility of saving the ship and cargo, and a part is deliberately sacrificed in order to save the remainder, it is a case for general average.[90] According to what have been said to be the best considered cases[91] the right to contribution is denied only in those circumstances in which the property sacrificed must inevitably,[92] or at least in all reasonable probability,[93] have been lost, not through the common peril, but owing to some situation or condition peculiar to itself, and independent of the peril, and whether or not the vessel and the rest of the cargo survive.[94] On the other hand, if the special danger is only a circumstance in the common peril and the sacrifice had been made in saving the balance of the venture from the common peril, contribution is allowed,[95] as where a portion of the ship's equipment has been displaced by the elements and, although of value, constitutes a special danger and is voluntarily sacrificed.[96]

§ 227. —— Perils and Losses Arising from Fault or Negligence

In the absence of statutory or contractual modification, no one is entitled to a contribution in general average, if the danger, to avert which the sacrifice was made or expense incurred, has arisen from a fault for which the claimant is responsible to the co-contributors, and a mere statutory release from liability does not give a right affirmatively to claim a general average contribution.

In the absence of statutory or contractual modification, as discussed infra § 232, no one is entitled to a contribution in general average, if the danger, to avert which the sacrifice was made or expense incurred, has arisen from a fault for which claimant has made himself, or is made by law, responsible to the co-contributors.[97] Under this principle the owner of the ship is not entitled to a general average contribution, where the loss is occasioned by the fault of the master or crew,[98] or where the owners are themselves at fault.[99] Release from liability for negligence when effected by statute, or more specifically the Harter Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 192, does not mean that an obligation is laid on the cargo to contribute to general average,[1] and a shipowner is not permitted, apart from contract, affirmatively to claim, in an action brought by himself, a general average contribution to meet his own losses occasioned by faults in the navigation and management of the ship.[2] Thus, although the owners of a vessel have been adjudged exempt from liability for damage to the cargo resulting from a fire due to the negligence of one of the crew, under the Harter Act, on the ground that they exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and in fit condition for the voyage, and were without personal negligence or fault, they cannot maintain an affirmative action against the owners of the cargo for contribution in general average to the ship's loss.[3] On the other hand, where a cargo owner institutes an action to recover a general average contribution, it has been held that since the statute prevents a recovery of damages based on the alleged negligence of the shipowner, the cargo owner may not derive any benefit from such alleged negligence,[4] and that, under the rule of reciprocity of right and obligation, as discussed supra § 224, the adjustment should be made as if there were no negligence in the case.[5] The negligent navigation of the master cannot in any event afford a pretext for depriving those shippers whose goods have been sacrificed of their claim to a general average contribution from other shippers,[6] since they are not privy to the master's acts, and are under no duty, legal or moral, to make a gratuitous sacrifice of their goods, for the sake of others, in order to avert the consequences of his fault.[7]

a. In General

Losses or damages arising from ordinary perils of the voyage do not give rise to claims in general average; nor do losses without design, but there need be no design to destroy or sacrifice any particular property.

Losses or damages arising from ordinary perils of the voyage do not give rise to claims in general average.[8] In view of the principle that there must be an intentional and voluntary sacrifice to avoid a common peril, as discussed supra § 224, a loss without design and as a mere incident of the voyage,[9] as where a ship is injured or disabled in a storm, without any voluntary sacrifice,[10] or founders or is shipwrecked, without design,[11] or requires repairs by reason of ordinary decay,[12] or is injured by reason of a swelling of the cargo from water entering through holes made by floating ice,[13] or is destroyed by an accidental fire,[14] is not the subject of general average. Losses which give rise to a claim in general average are usually divided into two classes, that is, those which arise from sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo, and those which arise from extraordinary expenses incurred for the common safety of ship, cargo, and freight.[15] There need be no design, however, to destroy or sacrifice any particular property[16] It is enough that there be a general design to pursue a particular course for the common safety, which results in loss[17] The design may be to save the very property which is lost.[18]

b. Property Sacrificed

There is no distinction as to the property sacrificed, and the right to general average extends to the loss of the ship, when the cargo is saved in whole or in part, as well as to the loss of the cargo when the ship is saved.

It follows from the Roman law that there is no distinction as to the property sacrificed, whether it be ship or cargo, a part or the whole,[19] the sole concern being that the sacrifice is voluntary to avert an imminent peril and that it is successful, as discussed supra § 224. The right to general average extends to the loss of the ship, when the cargo is saved in whole or in part, as well as to the loss of the cargo when the ship is saved.[20] Whether there are different contributory subjects does not affect general average.[21]

c. Baggage

Loss of, or injury to, passengers' baggage is the proper subject of contribution in general average, even though such baggage does not contribute in general average.

While reciprocity of obligation and right is the ordinary rule in general average, as discussed supra § 224, it is merely a circumstance in the usual application of the rule and not an indispensable part of the principle on which the right is founded, so that loss of, or injury to, passengers' baggage is the proper subject of contribution in general average,[22] even though such baggage does not contribute in general average, as discussed infra § 229.

d. Consequential Damage Resulting from Acts of Sacrifice

22. U.S.—Heye v. North German Lloyd, D C.N.Y, 33 F 60, affirmed, C C., 36 F. 60, 2 L.R.A. 287.

General average comprises all damages or expenses which were to be foreseen as the natural consequence of the first sacrifice [23] In determining whether the loss is the result of a voluntary act it has been held that, if a loss follows as the natural and inevitable result of the original and involuntary cause of danger, such original cause of danger should be regarded as the proximate cause,[24] but where a voluntary act intervenes, which in itself is a cause of loss, such act being substituted for the original danger of loss with a design of saving, the substituted act should be regarded as the proximate cause for general average purposes [25] Thus, damage to the cargo caused by cutting away a mast for safety of the ship and cargo must be included in a general contribution.[26] So, damage to ice cargo by delay and the opening of the hold of the ship for the purpose of making repairs has been held to be the subject of general average allowance.[27]

Damage sustained by reason of inevitable collision is not ordinarily a subject for general average contribution.

Damage sustained by reason of an inevitable collision is not ordinarily a subject for general average contribution,[28] even though the loss is apportioned between the vessels,[29] and a voluntary sacrifice made by one vessel to avoid collision with another does not give rise to a claim for contribution from the other.[30]

f. Fire and Water Damage

Damage done by water, or by steam, or by scuttling the ship in order to extinguish a fire is the subject of general average contribution, and the cargo has been held liable to contribute in general average for fire damage to the ship, but damage to the cargo caused by fire or smoke has ben held not allowable in general average.

Damage done by water,[31] or by steam,[32] or by scuttling the ship,[33] in order to extinguish a fire, is the subject of contribution in general average. So a voluntary flooding of a compartment in order to permit pumps to eject water, resulting in damage to the cargo in the compartment, is a proper general average charge.[34] A voluntary flooding of a stranded ship in order to keep it from pounding to pieces is also a proper general average charge.[35] However, where water gets in through the ordinary perils of the sea the damage caused thereby is not allowed in general average.[36] Damage to cargo caused by fire[37] or smoke[38] has been held not allowable in general average. Likewise, injury to that part of the cargo which is afire, caused by water admitted to extinguish the fire, has been held not to be a general average loss.[39] On the other hand, cargo has been held liable to contribute in general average to the ship for the ship's damage and expense occasioned by fire,[40] unless the contract of affreightment bars recovery,[41] and it has been held that sacrifices made to extinguish or prevent fires arising from the spontaneous combustion of the cargo constitute proper general average charges.[42]

g. Stranding or Running Ashore

Where a ship and cargo are exposed to a common danger and imminent peril by the accidental stranding of the vessel, the expense of saving them is a proper subject of contribution in general average, and, where the ship is voluntarily stranded or run ashore to avoid impending damage of shipwreck or other loss, the resulting loss is a general average charge.

Where a ship and cargo are exposed to a common danger and imminent peril by the accidental stranding of the vessel, the expense of saving them is a proper subject of contribution in general average[43] by the vessel, freight, and cargo, as discussed infra § 229, provided the vessel and cargo have been saved by the same series of measures taken for their safety during the continuance of the common peril which created the necessity for the sacrifices or expenditures.[44] However, if the stranding is due to negligent navigation, the vessel is not entitled, apart from contract, to contribution in general average from the cargo owners on account of salvage expenses, as discussed supra § 227, and if the object of the sacrifice is not attained and the ship is not got off no contribution is due.[45] Where the ship is voluntarily stranded or run ashore to avoid impending damage of shipwreck or other loss, the resulting loss is a general average charge,[46] even though the loss was probable[47] or inevitable,[48] provided, where the ship must go ashore, the place of stranding or running ashore was chosen.[49] While it has been held that, where a ship is voluntarily run ashore for the common good and is totally lost, the case is not one of general average,[50] the weight of authority is that such case is one of general average.[51]

If goods are thrown overboard for the purpose of lightening the ship in time of common peril, the loss is to be made good by the contribution of all, and, under the rule governing general average sacrifices, there must have been a common imminent peril, a voluntary, intentional sacrifice, and a successful termination.

If goods are thrown overboard for the purpose of lightening the ship in time of common peril, the loss is to be made good by the contribution of all.[52] The rule of general average in the Rhodian law applied especially,[53] but not exclusively,[54] to instances of jettison, and controversies with respect to the allowance or adjustment of general average arose more frequently in the earlier cases where the sacrifice consisted of a jettison of a portion of the cargo than in respect of any other kind of disaster in navigation.[55] Under the rule governing general average sacrifices, there must have been a common imminent peril,[56] a voluntary,[57] intentional,[58] sacrifice, and a successful termination.[59]

The danger that seams of stranded steamer's plating would open, master's realization of such peril, and intentional extraordinary use of steamer's engine machinery to drive her over bar into deeper water constituted elements of general average act.—Navigazione Generale Italiana v. If there be no imminent danger or necessity for the sacrifice, as if the jettison is made in a tranquil sea merely to lighten a ship too heavily laden, by the fault of the master, no contribution is due;[60] and if the object of the sacrifice is not attained, as if there be a jettison to prevent shipwreck, or to get the ship off the strand, and in either case, the object is not attained, no contribution is due.[61] It is not necessary, however that the goods shall have been thrown over with the intention of abandoning them,[62] since, if goods are exposed in barges[63] or on the beach[64] in order to float a stranded ship, and are lost or injured in consequence, the loss is regarded a proper general average charge.[65] So, also, the general rule, that where the person charged with control and protection of the common adventure determines on the general average act the emergency makes him the agent of all parties interested, as discussed supra § 225, applies to jettison.[66] The nature of the case imposes on the master the duty, and clothes him with the power, to judge and determine, on the facts before him, whether a jettison is necessary,[67] if he is a competent master, if an emergency actually existed calling for a decision whether to make a jettison of a part of the cargo, and if he appeared to arrive at his conclusion with due deliberation, by a fair exercise of his skill and discretion, with no unreasonable timidity, and with an honest intent to do his duty, the jettison is lawful.[68] Damage to the vessel incidental to the jettison is within the rule.[69]

(2) Deck Cargo

Ordinarily, the jettison of deck cargo does not give rise to a right to contribution in general average, although deck cargo is not exempt from contributing its share of the expense of a general average act.

Ordinarily, an exception to the general rule that general average contribution as to cargo or stores jettisoned is a proper charge exists in the case of jettison of deck cargo.[70] However, deck cargo is not exempt from contributing its share of the expense of a general average act.[71] This rule forms an exception to the general proposition that the intendment of general average contribution involves reciprocity of obligation and right.[72]

The foregoing rule is itself subject to qualification. The exception does not apply, by what has been said to be the weight of authority,[73] to those cases in which the carriage of cargo on deck is according to the custom and usage of the particular trade,[74] although there is also authority to the contrary,[75] nor does the exception apply to river craft.[76] Moreover, where a cargo is shipped on deck by agreement between the shipper and the vessel owner, the rule against the allowance of a deck cargo loss as general average does not apply so as to relieve the vessel or vessel owner from liability for contribution.[77] It has been held that the exception should be confined to sailing vessels,[78] since the reason for its application does not apply to vessels propelled by steam.[79] Likewise, the exception does not apply to the jettison of ship's property, usually carried on deck,[80] such as a boat.[81]

i. Putting into Port of Refuge

If a ship is in distress because of dangers of navigation, the act of putting into a port of refuge is a general average act.

j. Sale for Vessel's Necessities at Port of Refuge

Where part of the cargo is sold to raise funds to pay for necessary repairs, such sacrifice may be the subject of general average.

Where injury is sustained by a course pursued for the common safety of the ship and cargo, and the master has neither means nor credit to enable him to make the necessary repairs to continue the voyage, and his situation is such that he cannot communicate with the owners, he may sell a part of the cargo to meet the necessity of raising the means to make the repairs, as discussed supra § 66, and such sacrifice is the subject of general average.[85] So, where a cargo is partly damaged and the master sells it for the good of the cargo and ship on the shipper's refusal to receive it, as discussed supra § 149, and the sale price is less than the true value, the loss is general average,[86] and, where the goods of one shipper are sold by the master for the ship's necessities, such shipper may have contribution from the other cargo owners and is not restricted to his remedy against the ship or shipowner.[87]

k. Extraordinary Expenses and Services

All extraordinary expenses reasonably incurred in saving a vessel and her cargo from common peril resulting from the dangers of navigation encountered during the voyage are the subject of general average.

All extraordinary expenses reasonably incurred in saving a vessel and her cargo from common peril resulting from the dangers of navigation encountered during the voyage are the subject of general average.[88]

Expenses going to, at, and leaving port of refuge. It is well settled[89] that, when a vessel is disabled at sea and puts into a port of refuge for repair, the ordinary expenses incurred,[90] including every expense necessarily incurred during the detention, for the benefit of all concerned,[91] and in making such temporary repairs as are necessary to remove the inability of the vessel to proceed on her voyage,[92] are proper subjects of contribution So, charges of entering the port,[93] pilotage,[94] port charges;[95] quarantine dues;[96] dockage;[97] wharfage,[98] surveys on ship and cargo,[99] diver's charges;[1] expense with respect to unloading, storing, and reloading cargo;[2] fuel used during the time at the port of refuge;[3] the necessary expense of forwarding the cargo when such a course was one of the measures properly adopted for the safety of the joint venture, as discussed infra § 230; lighterage,[4] expense of pumping in order to keep ship afloat until repaired;[5] hire of anchors, cables, boats, and all other apparatus required for the purpose of making the repairs,[6] customhouse,[7] consul,[8] and notary,[9] fees; and the expense of leaving the port[10] are proper general average charges. However, expenses not incurred for the safety of all interests are not general average charges.[11] Likewise, expenses incurred in order to make repairs beyond what are reasonably necessary for that purpose are not regarded as general average.[12] Expenses incurred after putting in at a port of refuge in the expectation of continuing the voyage are not allowed as general average where the voyage is abandoned.[13] The performance of the ordinary duty of repair does not give rise to general average.[14]

Towage and salvage. Towage incurred for the purpose of taking the ship into a port of refuge for repairs because of a general average act or damage is a proper subject of general average.[15] However, towage incurred to take the vessel from the port of refuge to her port of destination is not a proper general average charge,[16] where it is unreasonable and unnecessary.[17] Salvage charges voluntarily incurred for common benefit are proper subjects of general average.[18]

Wages and provisions. With respect to wages and provisions of the master, officers, and crew during delay in a port of refuge for the purpose of repairs, it is well settled that such charges are allowed as general average,[19] commencing when the vessel alters her course for the purpose of putting into a port of refuge,[20] and continuing over the entire period of detention for repairs until the ship is ready to resume her voyage,[21] if proper diligence is employed in making the repairs.[22]

Commissions. The owners of the vessel may reasonably be allowed a commission based on usage and custom for collecting the general average.[23] However, neither the master's commission on disbursements[24] nor the premium of exchange on the amount expended at the port of refuge[25] is the subject of general average.

l. Embargo, Capture, and Escaping Capture

While the expenses of detention by embargo are not allowed as general average, sacrifice or loss incurred in escaping capture are the subject of general average.

While the expenses of detention by embargo are not allowed as general average,[26] sacrifice or loss incurred in escaping capture,[27] as where the ship is run ashore and part of the cargo is saved,[28] or part of the cargo is thrown overboard and the ship is thereby enabled to escape,[29] or a boat is set adrift at night to mislead the enemy,[30] and the costs and expenses incurred for the purpose of procuring the release of a captured vessel,[31] or during the detention of the captured vessel,[32] are the subjects of general average; but, it seems, not expenses incurred in a proceeding against the cargo only.[33]

§ 229. Liability to Contribute and Right to Contribution

The obligation to contribute in general average rests on the vessel, the cargo, the freight, and the owners of such interests, but there is no contribution from those whose lives have been saved.

The obligation to contribute in general average rests on the vessel,[34] and such obligation like-

Liability of government; free cargo. Where the government carries private cargo on one of its Army transports constituting a part of its armed forces and used only as a public wise, rests on the cargo,[35] the freight,[36] and the owners of such interests.[37] All property which is saved contributes,[38] except such as is attached to the persons of passengers,[39] or baggage in daily use by them,[40] and provisions;[41] and the property sacrificed, on its value as ascertained, contributes in common with that which is saved.[42] There is no contribution from those whose lives have been saved,[43] and seaman's wages are not subject to general average contribution.[44]

When right accrues. The right to contribution accrues if and when all the elements essential to its existence are present, regardless of whether the appropriate means of enforcement are a suit in rem or a suit in personam.[45]

§ 230. —— Separation of Interests and Termination of Danger

The liability of every portion of the cargo to contribute to general average continues until it has been completely separated from the rest of the cargo, and from the whole adventure, so as to leave no community of interest remaining.

The liability of every portion of the cargo to contribute to general average continues until it has been completely separated from the rest of the cargo, and from the whole adventure, so as to leave no community of interest remaining.[46] When the common danger has ceased to exist, no further sacrifice can be the subject of a general average contribution,[47] and, when the community of interest between the ship and cargo has been destroyed by a separation of the cargo from the ship, liability of the cargo to contribute in general average in favor of the ship is at an end.[48] In the application of this rule it has been held that cargo, although actually separated from the imperiled ship, may still, for the purpose of average, be constructively within it.[49] Separation may be made while the rest of the property is still in danger, and not rescued from the common peril.[50] The delivery of a part of the cargo to its owner at any time before the peril has occurred will discharge it from liability to contribute for a subsequent loss;[51] but, although the rule has been criticised,[52] it has been held that after measures have been commenced to avert a common peril, there can be no such separation of any portion of the property from the residue as will exempt it from contribution to the entire loss.[53]

Transshipment. Expense of transshipment at a port of refuge is not allowed in general average where the master reships in order to earn the original freight,[54] but the expense of transshipping the cargo, as a measure adopted to avoid a peril to the joint adventure, is a general average charge against the interests saved.[55]

English decisions not in complete accord

In the application of this rule the English and American decisions are not in complete accord and the tendency of the English decisions, it is said, is in favor of a strict adherence to the idea that contribution should cease when common danger has ceased, and that the danger to the saved cargo is to be regarded as ceasing when it is taken ashore to a place of safety—Reliance Marine Ins. § 231. —— Effect of Contract in General

Some authorities, but not others, hold that the right to, and liability for, contribution in general average, grows out of, and depends on, a contract implied by law from the relationship created by the contract of affreightment.

In some cases it has been held or recognized that the right to, and liability for, contribution in general average grows out of, and depends on, a contract implied by law from the relationship created by the contract of affreightment,[56] under which distinct properties of several persons are placed in a community of interest in a joint adventure,[57] and that the law will imply a contract from the relationship of the parties for the purpose of providing a remedy.[58] According to other authorities the right to, and liability for, contribution in general average is not based on the contract of carriage,[59] but arises out of participation in a common venture and depends on natural justice and an equity arising out of the relationship of the parties, as discussed supra § 224.

Ratification. Where consignees accept delivery, they must be deemed to ratify a general average agreement executed by agents as a necessary inducement to the delivery.[60]

§ 232. —— Contractual Enlargement or Limitation of, and Exeption from, Liability

Generally speaking, the parties to a shipping contract may by their contract enlarge or limit their liability to contribute to the general average or the reciprocal right to contribution, and, by virtue of the Harter Act, a clause or stipulation providing for general average liability notwithstanding negligence in navigation or management is valid, when it admits the shipowner to share in the general average only under circumstances where by the Harter Act he is relieved of responsibility.

Breach of loading provision relieving cargo not shown

A ship's failure to cross sand bar because of wrong signal as to depth of water, rather than negligence in loading, was not breach of provision that ship should not be loaded with more than could reasonably be expected to be carried over bar, and, hence, did not relieve cargo owner from liability for contribution in general average.—Navigazione Generale Italiana v. to permit a shipowner to contract with the cargo owners for a participation in general average contribution growing out of the negligence of his master and crew,[64] but, by virtue of the Harter Act, 46 U.S.C.A. §§ 191–195, a clause or stipulation in a shipper's document providing for general average liability notwithstanding negligence in navigation or management is valid,[65] when it admits the shipowner to share in the general average only under circumstances where by the Harter Act he is relieved from responsibility,[66] and such clause or stipulation has generally become known as a "Jason" clause.[67] Conversely, a clause or stipulation which admits the shipowner to share in the general average under circumstances where by the Harter Act he is not relieved of responsibility is invalid and does not entitle him to contribution.[68] It has been stated that a Jason clause in no way changes the essential features of general average contributions,[69] and that its effect is to invest the master with authority and responsibility to act directly for cargo with respect to cargo's duty to contribute in general average.[70] A shipowner will not be entitled to contributions in general average notwithstanding acts of negligence before the commencement of the voyage, in preparation therefor, as such acts do not relate to management of the vessel within the meaning of a Jason clause.[71] It is a condition precedent to liability under the Jason clause that the shipowner shall have exercised due diligence to make the vessel in all respects seaworthy and to have her properly manned, equipped, and supplied,[72] and it has been held that liability will not attach if such condition has not been com-

Charterer's duty to exercise due diligence to make ship seaworthy was not delegable.—Consumers Import Co. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha, C.C.A.N.Y., 133 F.2d 781, affirmed Consumers Import Co. v. Kabushiki Kaisha Kawaski Zosenjo, 64 S.Ct. 15, 320 U.S. 249, 88 L.Ed. 30.

Bill of lading without due diligence provision

Bill of lading providing for general average contributions, without due diligence provision, should be construed as requiring payment of general average for damage resulting from negligence in navigation, pro-

plied with even though there is no causal connection between such failure to comply and the danger, damage, or disaster that resulted in the loss.[73] On the other hand, where such condition is complied with, the cargo owner is under a duty to contribute to expenses and sacrifices occurring as a result of negligence in the management or operation of the ship,[74] and may thus be required to contribute to expenses resulting from the stranding of the ship due to faulty navigation[75] However, where as a result of such stranding the ship is rendered unseaworthy and the shipowner decides to have the ship complete its trip, any failure to discover the unseaworthiness of the ship as a result of the first stranding is not an error of navigation or management, but is a failure to fulfill the condition on which the right to contribution depends.[76]

A charterer is not released from liability to contribute by reason of a stipulation in the charter that his liability shall cease on the happening of a certain event.[77] An arrangement for procuring the submission of a statement in general average does not normally prevent questioning either the existence or the amount of the general average obligation.[78]

§ 233. Adjustment and Enforcement

a. In general
b. Place and time of adjustment
c. Interest
d. Validity and effect of adjustment or statement
e. Effect of payment

a. In General

It is the duty of the master to cause an average adjustment to be made. Remedies which the ship, cargo, and freight interests may be able to enforce against third persons cannot affect the value of the interests as to general average liability.

A master ordering a general average act is under a duty to exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain its effects, as discussed supra § 225, and, if due diligence would have disclosed its effects and shown damage or expenses giving rise to a right to contribution, he is under a duty to protect the interests entitled to such right.[79] It is the duty of the master to cause an average adjustment to be made[80] and to hold the property saved until the shares of the owners toward the average contribution are paid or secured, as discussed infra § 237. Remedies vided owner exercised due diligence to make vessel seaworthy.—May v Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt Aktien-Gesellschaft, C C A.N.Y., 54 S. Ct 162, 290 U S. 333, 78 L.Ed 348.

Unseaworthiness caused by improper stowage

Under bills of lading providing for contributions in general average by cargo owners if charterer shall have exercised due diligence in making ship seaworthy, if stowage of ship was such as made a fire likely, ship was unseaworthy—Consumers Import Co v. Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha, C C.A.N Y., 133 F 2d 781, affirmed Consumers Import Co. v. Kabushiki Kaisha Kawaski Zosenjo, 64 S Ct 15, 320 U.S 249, 88 L Ed. 30.

Owner not relieved by bill of lading

The provision in bills of lading that "If the shipowner shall have exercised due diligence to make the steamer . . . seaworthy . . . in case of . . . damage . . . resulting from accident . . . or from unseaworthiness . . . if the . . . unseaworthiness was not discoverable by the exercise of due diligence" the cargo should contribute in general average would not be construed by reason of use of word "accident" as requiring contribution in general average to losses although due diligence has not been used to make ship seaworthy.—Consumers Import Co. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha, C C.A.N.Y., 133 F.2d 781, affirmed Consumers Import Co v. Kabushiki Kaisha Kawaski Zosenjo, 64 S.Ct 15, 320 U.S 249, 88 L.Ed. 30.

Construction of Harter Act not binding

Whatever may be the rule as to the construction of the Harter Act with respect to the necessity of a causal connection between a failure to exercise due diligence as to seaworthiness and the loss or damage involved, the case is not necessarily the same with a contract voluntarily entered into between the shipper and carrier framed in language similar to the condition precedent in the statute.—Merklen v. Johnson & Higgins, supra.

However, in the Italian courts, as the Jason clause is interpreted, if the vessel is unfit but that condition has no relation to the disaster, the vessel owner may secure contribution from the cargo—The Maria, D C N Y., 15 F.Supp. 745.

Insufficient fuel not error in management

With respect to liability in general average for towing when fuel became exhausted, failure to take on sufficient fuel when steamship, undertaking voyage by stages, refueled for last time was not "default or error in navigation or management" within Jason clause—The Glymont, C C.A.N.Y, 66 F.2d 617.

which the ship, cargo, and freight interests may be able to enforce against third persons cannot affect the value of the interests as to general average liability.[81]

b. Place and Time of Adjustment

The place of adjustment of general average is a question of convenience, and may be controlled by contractual provisions, and it has been stated that the contribution owing is payable when the property rescued is taken to its destination.

The place of adjustment of general average is a question of convenience rather than of theory or duty,[82] and may be controlled by contractual provisions.[83] It has been stated that the contribution owing is payable when the property rescued is taken to its destination.[84] It has been the practice to have the adjustment prepared at the port of destination;[85] but, when the voyage is broken up and ended and a final separation between vessel and cargo has taken place, it is common practice to have it made up at the port where the adventure comes to an end.[86]

c. Interest

Interest may be allowed on the amount of a general average contribution.

Interest may be allowed on the amount of a general average contribution.[87] Parties entitled to a return of deposits wrongfully exacted by a shipowner to secure general average contributions have been held entitled to recover interest thereon from the date of collection,[88] even though the shipowner earned no interest thereon,[89] and, where a deposit is properly required, but more is demanded than is necessary, it has been held that interest may be recovered on the amount of overpayment from the date of the statement of general average.[90]

A waiver of the right to interest will not be presumed from the fact that the general average adjustment was not made up at the outward port of destination.[91]

d. Validity and Effect of Adjustment or Statement

In the ordinary course a general average statement is merely the shipowner's version of the account between the parties, and, in the absence of an agreement otherwise providing, is not conclusive, although it will generally be taken as the proper basis for determining the rights of the parties in subsequent litigation in the absence of fraud, error, or unfairness.

Generally speaking, a general average statement must be viewed as an ex parte document,[92] and, when made by average adjusters, it is not an award made on a submission to arbitrators.[93] In the ordinary course, it is merely the shipowner's version of the account as between the parties.[94] However, the shipper or the consignee may by agreement make the statement of the shipowner or adjusters conclusive,[95] although, in the absence of such agreement, it is not conclusive,[96] or even prima

Adjustment by court not res judicata
Where application is made to a court of competent jurisdiction to make an adjustment of general average and the court appoints average adjusters to act in the matter and the issue as to the seaworthiness of the vessel is never presented to, or considered by, the adjusters or the court facie proof of the amount claimed to be due.[97] Nevertheless, an average adjustment will generally be taken as the proper basis for determining the rights of the parties in subsequent litigation between them, in the absence of fraud, error, or unfairness.[98] An average statement put out by the shipowner or by average adjusters whom he has employed is an admission on the shipowner's part that the cargo owner is entitled to the sum shown due him in that statement,[99] and it has been held that it will be conclusive between the owner of the ship and the owner of the cargo to the extent that the former will be bound to deliver the goods on payment or tender according to the adjustment.[1] When a case of general average is settled in a foreign port where it should be settled, the adjustment will be conclusive as to the items as well as the apportionment thereof, on the various interests, although it may be different from that which the law of the home port would have required.[2]

Money voluntarily paid on a claim for general average cannot be recovered back, but it has been held that the fact that a contribution in general average has been paid does not preclude the one paying it from recovering it when equitable considerations require the repayment.

Money voluntarily paid on a claim for general average cannot be recovered back,[3] but, if money is paid under protest to the master in order to obtain possession of cargo held on an unfounded claim of general average, it may be recovered back.[4] Since a general average adjustment is not analogous to an account stated,[5] it has been held that the fact that a contribution in general average has been paid does not preclude the one paying from recovering it when equitable considerations require the repayment.[6] When a deposit is made to secure a general average contribution, it has been held that liability to repay the amount of an overpayment arises ex contractu on the date when the general average is stated and apportioned.[7]

In the absence of a controlling agreement to the contrary, ordinarily the average is computed and adjusted according to the law of the port of discharge, that is, the port of destination, or the port where the adventure is actually terminated.

In the absence of a controlling agreement to the contrary,[8] ordinarily the average is computed and adjusted according to the law of the port of discharge,[9] that is, the port of destination,[10] or, when the voyage is broken up and abandoned, the port where the adventure is actually terminated.[11] Where there are special contract provisions limiting or modifying the application of this law, the extent and effect of these provisions cannot be determined apart from consideration of the rule limited, that is, without consideration of the law of the port of destination.[12] The general maritime law governs as far as it determines the rules of apportionment, where the parties have contracted for an adjustment in accordance with the laws and usage of

except in a purely ex parte and very casual manner and the adjusters gave the cargo owners no notice of their intention to consider the question and no notice of application for approval and confirmation of the report of the adjusters was ever given to the owners or consignees of the cargo in question, the determination of such court that the vessel was seaworthy will not be deemed res judicata of that issue in subsequent proceedings in another court by the cargo owners to recover the value of the cargo lost, based on unseaworthiness of the vessel—The Maria, D C Va., 20 F.Supp. 284.

§ 235. —— Basis and Mode of Adjustment

a. In general
b. As to cargo
c. As to vessel
d. As to freight
e. Amount paid in limited liability proceedings

a. In General

The parties to a shipping contract may by agreement fix the basis and mode of adjustment, and generally speaking the problem of average adjustment is one of exact reimbursement and proportionately equal contributions as between vessel, cargo, and freight, the owners of the several interests being bound to make contributions in the proportion of the value of their interests.

The parties to a shipping contract may by agreement fix the basis and mode of adjustment of a general average,[15] and a provision under which the parties bind themselves to arbitration as to general average is not unlawful.[16] Generally speaking, the problem of average adjustment is always one of exact reimbursement and proportionately equal contributions as between vessel, cargo, and freight.[17] The owners of the several interests in the joint adventure are bound to make contribution in the proportion of the value of their interests.[18] The basis of valuation may be fixed by agreement of the parties[19] In the absence of such agreement, however, there is some diversity of opinion as to the basis of valuations in general average.[20] It has been declared that an average adjuster must be allowed some leeway in fixing values.[21] The contribution is to be paid in the currency of the country in which the voyage terminated,[22] and at such rate of exchange as will give exact reimbursement.[23]

Costs and expenses of adjustment. Proper costs and expenses incurred with respect to a general average adjustment are chargeable to the general average fund.[24]

Designation of adjuster. Even though a general average agreement designates a particular adjuster, an adjustment made by another competent adjuster is not objectionable in the absence of any showing of prejudice resulting from the change in adjusters.[25]

b. As to Cargo

The whole value of the portion of the cargo sacrificed is not to be replaced, but only as much as will put the owner in as good position as if, instead of his property, other of equal value had been destroyed, and, in the absence of an agreement otherwise providing, the general rule is that the value of the cargo is taken as of the time and place of discharge.

Since the spirit and intendment of the law of contribution in general average are to place the persons interested, as near as may be, in the same relative position which they occupied before the peril was met, as discussed supra § 224, the whole value of the portion of the cargo sacrificed is not to be replaced, but only as much as will put the owner in as good a position as if, instead of his property, other of equal value had been destroyed, and this is effected in the calculation by making the owner of the property sacrificed a party to the contribution in respect of the amount to be contributed.[26] The basis of valuation of the cargo in general average may be fixed by agreement of the parties.[27] In the absence of such agreement, while it has been held that in computing contributory values for the purpose of a general average adjustment the value of the cargo is to be taken at its first cost, or invoice price, and charges at the port of departure,[28] the general rule is that the value of the cargo is taken as of the time and place of discharge,[29] such as the port of destination,[30] and, where property is lost, at the price it would have brought at that port.[31] If the goods are sold at the place to which the apportionment relates, the amount of the proceeds is the basis on which their value is fixed,[32] and, if damaged goods are sold, the difference between the sale price and the valuation of the goods when sound is the amount to be allowed.[33] In the absence of better proof, the damage to the cargo to be allowed for may be ascertained by a comparison of the proceeds of sale with the invoice cost,[34] or, if the vessel has arrived at her port of destination, with its value at such port.[35] If the ship is unable to return to port or to reach an intermediate port, the cargo contributes at its invoice value, deducting therefrom salvage and other necessary expenses incurred in consequence of the wreck.[36] In case of total loss of the ship voluntarily stranded for the safety of the cargo, all the property exposed to the risk must contribute, and be contributed for at its value, when the sacrifice was made.[37] So, in the case of jettison, the value of the goods thrown overboard is taken at the prime cost or original value if the vessel does not arrive,[38] or at their value at the port of destination if she does arrive.[39]

c. As to Vessel

In the absence of an agreement otherwise providing, the basis of the valuation of the vessel in general average has been held to be her market value, and, if the ship arrives, her value is to be taken as it exists at the time of arrival at the place where the voyage terminates, otherwise as it was at the port of departure, or, in the case of stranding, her value at the time of stranding is determined without regard to her then peril.

The basis of the valuation of the vessel in general average may be controlled by agreement of the parties,[40] and, in the absence of such agreement, it has been held that the market value is controlling.[41] If the ship arrives, her value is to be taken as it exists at the time of the arrival at the place where the voyage terminates,[42] otherwise as it was at the port of departure,[43] or, in the case of stranding, her value at the time stranding is determined on without regard to her then peril,[44] estimated at the sum named in the policy of insurance,[45] or at

(1) It has been held, however, that while, as between the parties to the policy, the value of the vessel in the policy may be taken, as against cargo owners, such evidence is only auxiliary and the value must be established in the ordinary way.—Mutual Safety Ins. Co. v. Cargo of The George, D.C.N.Y., 17 F.Cas.No. 9,981, Olcott 89—Mutual Safety Ins. Co. v.

the valuation given in invoices and bills of lading,[46] making reasonable allowance for wear and tear on the voyage up to the time of the disaster.[47] The owners contribute according to her value and the net amount of her earnings for the voyage.[48] If the ship has encountered particular average damage prior to the general average sacrifice, that will be deducted from her value just before the general average sacrifice took place,[49] and, if the voyage is terminated at an intermediate port because of injuries sustained by the cargo, the charges of repairing the vessel subsequently may be referred to for the purpose of determining the value of the injuries sustained by her for the common benefit[50] Since the owners of a cargo are liable to contribute in general average for masts, spars, rigging, etc, cut away for the purpose of saving the vessel and cargo, as discussed supra § 228 h, the value of such material should be estimated as the value at the time they were cut away,[51] that is, as if it had been recovered from the sea and stowed in safety on board the vessel.[52]

d. As to Freight

The amount of freight due on cargo is deducted therefrom in determining its value, but, if freight has been paid in advance or secured absolutely, although only part of the cargo is delivered in consequence of a lawful jettison, the shipper or consignee is not disallowed freight in the average adjustment, and it has been held that the cost of earning the freight saved is deducted.

The cargo owners contribute according to the value thereof at the port of delivery, as discussed supra subdivision b of this section, after deducting freight due thereon,[53] and the cargo lost is taken at the price it would have brought at the port of destination, less the amount of freight thereon.[54] When freight is not payable on goods not delivered, as discussed supra § 160, in proving the foreign value the owner of goods jettisoned must deduct any expense from their value which the jettison has saved him,[55] including freight,[56] but in that case the whole freight on the jettisoned goods is allowed to the master[57] On the other hand, where part of the cargo has been sacrificed, contribution is made to the vessel on total freight lost, which also contributes, as discussed supra § 229, and if, under the terms of a charter party, the freight has been paid in advance or secured absolutely, although only a part of the cargo is delivered in consequence of a lawful jettison, the shipper or consignee is not disallowed freight in the average adjustment,[58] but may prove both the value of the goods and the freight paid or secured[59] The cost of earning the freight saved is deducted,[60] and, under statutes[61] and rules adopted at some ports,[62] the contributory value of freight has been taken at a prescribed percentage of that contracted to be paid. Where part of the cargo is jettisoned and the vessel is enabled to carry new cargo and does so, if the net new freight exceeds the general average expense, it has been held that there has in fact been no loss and no contribution is due from anyone,[63] and, if the general average expense exceeds the amount of the net new freight, then only the amount of the excess should be apportioned among the contributing interests.[64]

e. Amount Paid in Limited Liability Proceedings

A distribution under a decree in limited liability proceedings and a general average adjustment relate to different subjects, and the amount paid under the decree is properly reapportioned in general average.

A distribution under a decree in limited liability proceedings, as discussed infra § 256, and a general average adjustment relate to different subjects,[66] and the amount paid under the decree is properly reapportioned in general average.[67]

When a general average sacrifice is made or expense incurred, the property saved is subject to a lien for contribution, and such lien is a jus in re, but the lien on cargo is dependent on possession.

When a general average sacrifice is made or expense incurred, the property saved is subject to a lien for contribution.[68] Thus, there is a lien on the goods for general average contributions due in respect of them,[69] and cargo owners have a lien for general average.[70] Such lien is a jus in re, a property interest in the property affected, adhering to it wherever it may go,[71] and, if the lien is lost through no fault of the holder, he is entitled to compensation therefor.[72] The lien on cargo is dependent on possession[73] and is lost by its delivery to the owner or consignee.[74] The lien is not necessarily lost as against a subsequent mortgagee by a delay in asserting the claim.[75]

§ 237. —— Exacting Bond or Security

All property saved may be retained until the shares of the owners toward average contributions are paid or secured, and the usual method of enforcing the claim for contribution is by requiring a deposit of money or the execution of a bond.

All property saved may be retained until the shares of the owners toward the average contribution are paid[76] or secured.[77] Indeed, it is the duty of the master to hold the property until such shares are paid or secured,[78] at least in cases where due diligence to ascertain the effects of the general average act would have disclosed damage or expenses giving rise to a right to contribution,[79] and for breach of this duty the shipowner may be held liable.[80] The usual method of enforcing the claim for such contribution is by requiring a deposit of money[81] or the execution of an average bond before delivery,[82] and the latter is the more common practice.[83] Such bond may be required by reason of contractual provisions,[84] and the form of bond demanded must be strictly in accordance with the terms of such provisions and the rights arising thereunder.[85] The bond should not impose unreasonable terms or conditions which exclude the methods afforded by law for determining the existence and extent of liability.[86] Parties who voluntarily avail themselves of average bonds to obtain possession are bound by the obligations so assumed.[87] A person is not precluded by the execution of a general average bond or other security from defending against any general average liability.[88] An agreement executed as security for the payment of an average contribution and intended to take the place of the lien therefor has been held to give the person asserting his rights thereunder no greater rights than he would have had if he were asserting his lien.[89]

§ 238. —— Action or Suit to Enforce

Each owner of goods sacrificed may enforce his general average contribution claim against the owners of the ship and cargo by direct action at law, and the shipowner may also maintain an action against cargo for contribution, and equity has jurisdiction to enforce a claim for contribution.

Each owner of goods sacrificed may enforce his general average contribution claim against the owners of the ship[90] and cargo[91] by direct action at law, and the common-law courts have jurisdiction to enforce the promise by the owner of goods which is implied on their delivery to him.[92] The shipowner may also maintain an action against the cargo for contribution[93] If the master fails to perform the duty of retaining the cargo until the amount payable by each contributor is paid or secured, as discussed supra § 237, an action to recover the amount of the average lies in favor of those entitled to contribution against the master,[94] the ship,[95] or her owners.[96] Equity also has jurisdiction to enforce a claim for contribution.[97] An action or suit may be maintained to recover the excess amount of a general average deposit.[98] In a proper case an action will lie to compel an accounting by general average adjusters of their acts as such.[99]

Time to sue. Actions relating to average contributions must be seasonably commenced.[1] With respect to the time for commencement of an action in personam to recover a general average contribution, it has been held that such right of action accrues when a general average statement is prepared and issued by the shipowner.[2]

Parties. In an action to compel contribution, an objection that there are other owners subject to the claim cannot avail unless the plea discloses the omitted parties.[3] A time charterer who issued bills of lading has a right to recover general average.[4] There may be an election as to the party to be sued[5] General average adjusters have been held to have the right and duty to pursue recalcitrant general average debtors in appropriate proceedings.[6]

Set-off. Persons obligated to make a general average contribution to the shipowner may offset the amount thereof by valid claims against the shipowner.[7]

Pleading. General rules of pleading have been applied in actions or suits to enforce a general average adjustment.[8] Where, in an action by cargo consignees on a bill of lading for failure to deliver part of the cargo, the shipowners in their answer offer to pay contribution in general average as to the cargo jettisoned and that sold, recovery may be had.[9] It has been stated that it is better pleading in a general average case for libelants to state separately in short articles all the steps leading up to the statement of the general average by the adjusters, including all such allegations as are necessary to establish the statement as a valid statement of general average under the circumstances involved.[10]

Evidence. Libelant has the burden of proving his right to general average contribution[11] by a fair preponderance of the evidence.[12] On the other hand, the burden of proving the defense alleged rests on defendant.[13] A party carrying the burden of proof as to a particular matter may start with a presumption in his favor,[14] such as a presumption that the vessel was seaworthy,[15] but it has been held that such a presumption does not shift the burden of proof on the issue,[16] although there is also authority to the contrary.[17] Where, shortly after leaving port, the vessel, without encountering any stress of weather or unusual perils of the sea, becomes so disabled that it is obliged to put into a port of refuge, it has been held that a presumption arises of unseaworthiness when she sailed;[18] but, where the general average bond contains a recital that the ship had "encountered strong winds and a heavy sea, which caused the vessel to labor severely," libelant is entitled to a prima facie presumption that the ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.[19]

General rules of evidence governing the admissibility,[20] and the weight and sufficiency,[21] of evidence have been applied in actions of this character.

Trial. The general rule that all questions of fact are to be decided by the jury or the court acting as the trier of fact applies in actions relating to general average contribution.[22] A decree for general average contribution cannot be entered in favor of cargo owners not parties to the record,[23] and the defect is not cured by the alleged failure of the shipowner to obtain security from such cargo owners[24] or to have a general average statement.[25]

Dismissal Where proper grounds therefor exist, an action or suit to enforce a general average claim may be dismissed.[26]

Costs. General rules governing the awarding of costs have been applied.[27] It has been held that one seeking a proper general average adjustment should bear the costs of the suit unless the amount finally awarded to him is greater than the amount theretofore tendered with interest.[28]

XII. STATUTORY LIMITATION OF SHIPOWNER'S LIABILITY

§ 239. In General

The right of a shipowner to limit his liability depends on statute. The purposes of the federal statute providing for limited liability are to encourage investments in shipbuilding and shipping and afford an opportunity for the determination of claims against the vessel and its owner; and it should be liberally construed and applied so as to give effect to such purposes.

Except in so far as the parties may agree to a limitation of liability in their contract or the bill of lading, as discussed supra §§ 131–138, the right of

Expert testimony estimating fuel consumption

With respect to liability in general average for towing necessitated by depletion of fuel, where two experts testified that a vessel's normal fuel requirements are based on the average of her past performances plus a certain percentage without consideration of the conditions to be expected on the particular voyage and one testified that his practice was to take into consideration the wind, weather, and currents he would expect to meet in the particular voyage, there was no error on the part of the court, sitting as a trier of fact, in determining that the vessel's requirements should be calculated with respect to conditions to be expected on a particular voyage plus the higher percentage of surplus used by one of the experts — The Glymont, C.C A N Y., 66 F.2d 617.

the owner of a vessel to limit his liability is dependent on statute.[29] Although the federal statute providing for the limited liability of vessel owners, 46 U.S.C.A. § 181 et seq, adopts or is based on the general maritime law,[30] the statute,[31] and not the general maritime law,[32] must be interpreted and administered in determining questions as to such limitation of liability. The statute is a part of the maritime code or laws of the United States.[33]

Validity of statutes. The power of congress to grant the right of limitation of liability exists under the constitutional power of congress to regulate commerce;[34] but it rests also on the power derived from the admiralty clause of the federal Constitution,[35] and not, therefore, alone on the power to regulate commerce.[36] This has been held to be true both as to the original act of 1851[37] and the amendments thereto[38]

Repugnancy as to other provisions or ordinances. In case of repugnancy between state constitutional or statutory provisions,[39] or municipal ordinances,[40] and the federal statutes providing for limitation of liability, the federal statutes control. The federal statute requiring the marking of wrecks, discussed in Navigable Waters § 45 c, is not restricted by the statute providing for the limitation of liability.[41]

Purposes of statute The purposes of the federal statute providing for limited liability, which is based on sound public policy,[42] are to encourage investments in shipbuilding and shipping[43] and to afford an opportunity for the determination of claims against the vessel and the owner.[44] Stated more specifically, its purposes are to encourage shipbuilding[45] and the employment of vessels in navigation, commerce, and trade,[46] and, in this connection, to induce the investment of funds[47] by exempting the investor from loss in excess of the fund which he is willing to risk in the enterprise[48] as represented, in general, by the vessel concerned,[49] and thus to place the United States on a like footing with other countries in respect of the merchant marine.[50] The purpose of the statute, moreover, is to provide a shipowner with a method not only of limiting his liability, but also of protecting himself against loss by providing himself with insurance.[51] However, the purpose of the statute was not concerned with the construction of vessels as a mere enterprise of manufacture, which itself is not a maritime activity;[52] nor is it the object of the statute and the proceeding pursuant to it to preclude injured persons from pursuing any remedy open to them against others.[53]

Construction and application of statute in general. The statute should be and has been broadly and liberally construed and applied so as to achieve its purpose;[54] and in this connection it should, in general, be fairly and liberally construed and applied in favor of the vessel owner.[55] However, this liberality of construction cannot be extended so that express conditions laid down by the statute are waived or ignored,[56] and it should not be so construed as to extend the statute beyond its purposes.[57] Moreover, this rule of liberal construc-

Liability of owner for negligence

Statute providing for limitation of vessel owner's liability was enacted for purpose of encouraging shipbuilding and employment of ships in commerce, and therefore should not be so construed as to permit owner of small speedboat, carrying passengers for hire on inland waters, to escape liability for his negligence or negligence of his copartner and agent —Kulack v. The Pearl Jack, supra.

tion and application is subject to certain limitations in respect of the extent of the owner's liability under the statute, as discussed infra § 242 b, d, and, according to one view, only requires that the limitation shall not be denied on purely technical or for insufficient reasons;[58] and liberality of enforcement should not be carried to an extent which will deprive cargo owners and passengers of that degree of care on the part of those owning and operating vessels which their safety demands and to which they are entitled.[59] The statute must be given a sensible construction;[60] and a literal application, which would lead to an absurd consequence, should be avoided whenever a reasonable application can be given, consistent with the legislative purpose.[61] The fact that the value of the vessel is small and that limiting the liability to such amount may be unfortunate in its effect does not prevent the application of the statute in a proper case.[62]

Construing statutes together. The various statutes relating to the limitation of the liability of shipowners are in pari materia[63] So also, the original federal Limitation of Liability Act and the amendments thereto are in pari materia[64] and must be construed together.[65]

Prospective operation only. Statutes making substantial changes in the right accorded by prior statutes with respect to the limitation of liability of a shipowner should be accorded only prospective operation with respect to such changes,[66] at least where a legislative intent for retroactivity does not appear,[67] and should not be applied to rights or causes of action existing at the time of their enactment.[68]

Existence of liability as essential. The federal statute does not impose liability, but merely limits a liability assumed already to exist on other grounds.[69] In fact, the whole doctrine of limitations of liability presupposes that a liability exists which is to be limited, so that if no liability exists there is nothing to limit[70]

Effect of insurance. The right to limit liability is not affected by the fact that the vessel has been insured and the insurance has been paid or become payable.[71]

Proceedings in rem or in personam. The statutory provision for limitation of liability applies to proceedings in rem against the ship,[72] as well as to proceedings in personam against the owner,[73] and the limitation extends to the owner's property as well as to his person;[74] and the right of the owner of a vessel to limit his liability cannot be frustrated by the mere failure of the injured person to file a libel in rem or to allege liability on the part of the vessel.[75]

§ 240. Vessels Included; Place of Navigation

The right to limitation of liability under the federal statutes applies, except as to certain provisions thereof, to all vessels, regardless of size, purpose, or place of navigation; and it may apply to foreign vessels, in favor of foreign owners, even though the injury and resultant liability occur on the high seas or in foreign waters.

Under the federal statute relating to limited liability, 46 U S C.A § 188, the privileges granted apply to all vessels.[76] Thus the right to limitation of liability is not based on the question of the size of the craft;[77] nor is it material to what purposes the vessels are put;[78] and the statute includes pleasure craft.[79] Indeed, a "wreck" has been held to be a "vessel" within the statute providing for limitation of liability.[80] On the other hand, the applicability of the statute to certain water craft or structures has been denied.[81]

Vessels within increased liability provisions. The statute as amended in 1935, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183, subd. (b)–(f), providing for increased liability under certain circumstances, is applicable only to "seagoing vessels" as that term is expressly limited by the statute and construed by the courts.[82]

Place of navigation of vessel. The statute providing for limited liability applies to all seagoing vessels, and also to all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, including canal boats, barges, and lighters;[83] and the vessel need not be one engaged in maritime commerce.[84]

Vessel not on voyage. The fact that the vessel was not actually engaged in a voyage at the time the liability was incurred does not prevent the application of the statute;[85] and the statute applies to a vessel at a dock in her home port[86] or while laid up for the winter.[87]

Foreign vessels. The federal statute providing for limited liability applies to foreign vessels,[88] in

Prior provisions

(1) While the act in its original form by express provision did not apply to any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation, the broad view has been expressed that by the amendment of 1886, by which the operation of the act was greatly extended to include all seagoing vessels and also all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, including canal boats, barges, and lighters, congress intended to grant the privilege of limiting liability in respect of all water craft —The Muriel, D.C.Wash., 25 F.2d 505—58 C.J. p. 635 note 45

(2) The validity of such amendment has been upheld—Ex parte Garnett, Ga., 11 S.Ct. 840, 141 U.S. 1, 35 L.Ed. 631.

(3) The amendment had no retroactive operation—Chappell v. Bradshaw, C.C.Md., 35 F. 923—58 C.J. p. 635 note 41 [a].

(4) The original act was not repealed by the amendment of 1884—Chappell v. Bradshaw, supra.

(5) Even prior to the amendment of 1886, the act was applied to a tugboat towing a vessel engaged in interstate commerce—In re Vessel Owners' Towing Co., D.C.Ill., 26 F. 169.

Under the statutory statement of rules of construction defining the word "vessel" as including an artificial contrivance used, or "capable" of being used, as a means of transportation on water, 1 U.S.C.A. § 3, "capable" is to be read as "practically capable."—Petition of Kansas City Bridge Co., D.C.Mo., 19 F.Supp. 419.

favor of foreign owners,[89] where the enforcement, and limitation, of liability, are sought in the courts of this country, even where the liability or claims arise from a collision occurring on the high seas,[90] or in the territorial waters of a country to which neither of the colliding vessels belongs,[91] or where only one vessel is involved in a disaster on the high seas.[92] In such case the statutes of the United States, and not the law of the country of the vessel, in respect of which liability is sought, is applied,[93] even though there is no showing as to what, if any, is the law of such country,[94] and even though it appears that the law of such country provides for limitation on terms and conditions different from those prescribed by the laws of the United States.[95] It has been held or recognized that the rule permitting the application of the laws of the United States applies as well when it operates in favor of, as when it operates against, the foreign vessel or its owner.[96]

§ 241. Persons Entitled to Benefit of Limitation

The rights and benefits of the federal statute providing for limited liability inure only to owners; but the term "owners" includes a charterer who mans, victuals, and navigates a vessel at his own expense or procurement.

While the term "owner" as used in the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183, limiting the liability of the owner of a vessel to the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending, is taken in a broad and popular sense, in order not to defeat the manifest intent of the statute,[97] the rule is, except with respect to charterers, that the rights and benefits of the statute inure only to owners,[98] and to such owners only as fall within the description of the statute.[99] Accordingly, in order to avail himself of the right granted by the statute, the shipowner must bring himself within the terms fixed by the statute.[1]

Vendor retaining title as security. A vendor retaining title to a vessel solely for the purpose of securing his purchase price is not, prior to default, liable as owner for the acts of the vendee or of the master and crew, within the scope of the statute,[2] and a manufacturer so retaining legal title is not entitled to the limitation of liability for injuries and damages resulting from neglect in the manufacture of the vessel.[3]

Part owners. Under the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 189, providing that the individual liability of a shipowner shall be limited to the proportion of any or all debts and liabilities that his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole, and that the aggregate liabilities of all the owners of a vessel on account thereof shall not exceed the value of such vessel and freight pending, the right of less than all owners to claim limitation has been recognized or upheld,[4] and the fact that one of several owners is not entitled to claim the benefit of the statute does not of itself prevent another owner from claiming the benefit.[5]

Corporations and corporate stockholders. In a proper case a corporation is entitled to the benefit of the federal statute providing for the limitation of liability of vessel owners.[6] Moreover, in applying the rule that the statute should be liberally construed, and that the word "owner" must be taken in a popular sense in order not to defeat the legislative purpose, it has been held that stockholders of a corporation to which the vessel in question belonged may be regarded as owners within the meaning, and therefore entitled to claim the benefit, of the statute.[7]

The United States, as the owner of a vessel, has been held to be entitled to limit its liability for damages for delay and failure to transport cargo to the value of the vessel.[8]

Insurer. An underwriter to whom a stranded vessel has been abandoned as a total loss is an "owner" within the meaning of the act.[9]

Effect of charter or lack thereof. Under an express provision of the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 186, that the charterer of any vessel in case he shall man, victual, and navigate such vessel at his own expense, or by his own procurement, shall be deemed the owner of such vessel within the act, a charterer who comes within the scope of the provision is entitled to limit his liability,[10] but one who does not man, victual, and navigate the vessel involved, at his own expense or procurement, may not claim the benefit of the act.[11] On the other hand, the fact that one not the owner of a vessel mans, victuals, and navigates her does not entitle him to limitation of liability unless he is a charterer;[12] nor is a mere bailee entitled to limitation of liability.[13] In any event, the right of the owners to proceed under the act exists even though they

Charterer of barge

The provision applies to barges; and the original charterer of a barge alone who employed a barge captain whose wages he continued to pay and subchartered the barge accompanied by barge captain to railroad company was an "owner" of barge within provision, since such barge was manned and navigated by captain procured by charterer who was entitled to limitation of liability where he was without knowledge or privity as to negligent acts of barge captain causing injuries.—The Martha R. § 242. Extent of Liability and Compensation Fund

a. In general
b. Items and vessels included in compensation fund
c. Computation of value
d. Freight pending
e Interest
f. Under Carriage of Goods by Sea Act

a. In General

Except in so far as provision is made for increased liability in certain instances, the liability of a shipowner under the federal statute is limited to the value of his interest in the vessel and her pending freight. Under a provision to that effect, the liability of a part owner is limited to his proportionate share of the liability or debt.

Under the federal statute providing for limited liability, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183, the liability of the owner of a vessel, who is entitled to the benefit of the act, may not exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending,[15] except in so far as special provision is made for increased liability. The measure of liability is the same whether the vessel and freight are transferred or whether their value is paid into court for apportionment.[16]

Total loss. Except where the special provision for increased liability is applicable, in a case of total loss an owner will in substance be entirely discharged from losses occurring on the voyage in respect of which the owner is entitled to limitation,[17] even though the actual damage to, or loss of, the goods to be carried,[18] as in the case of theft,[19] took place before the destruction of the vessel.

Provision for increased liability. Under the amendment of 1935, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183, subds. (b)–(f), the amount of the owner's liability, as based on the value of the owner's interest in the vessel, may, where such amount is insufficient to pay all losses in full, and the portion of such amount applicable to the payment of losses in respect of loss of life or bodily injury is less than a specified amount per ton of the vessel's tonnage, be increased to such specified amount.[20]

Distinct interests in vessel. The provision of the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 189, that the individual liability of a shipowner shall be limited to the proportion of any or all debts and liabilities which his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole, and that the aggregate liabilities of all the owners on account thereof shall not exceed the value of such vessel and freight pending, relieves part owners, who are entitled to the benefit of the statute, from liability in solido[21] for the liabilities or debts of each other,[22] leaving them liable only for their proportionate shares of the liability or debt;[23] and it also confines the liability of each part owner entitled to the limitation to his individual interest in the vessel and her freight,[24] subject to the rules as to the liability of a part owner as to his personal contract, discussed infra § 243 b (1), and as to his privity or knowledge, discussed infra § 244 a.

Division of loss. When both vessels are at fault for a collision, the general rule that the damage is to be divided equally between them and a decree made for one half the difference between their respective losses in favor of one who has suffered most, so as to equalize the burden, discussed in Collision § 186, is first given effect,[25] and the amount so arrived at is treated as the unlimited liability of the owner against whom the decree is given to the owner of the other vessel, and the former's claim for limitation is to be made in respect of such amount,[26] even though the other vessel is lost.[27]

b. Items and Vessels Included in Compensation Fund

The federal statute providing for limited liability should not receive too narrow a construction as to the items which constitute the compensation fund. Ship's stores and equipment, and damages recoverable for injury to the vessel, are included; but neither insurance on the vessel nor cargo is included. Generally, where one of several vessels owned by the same person is at fault, only such vessel is to be included.

Notwithstanding the general rule that the federal statute relating to limited liability is to be liberally construed in favor of the shipowner, discussed supra § 239, the view has been taken that it should not receive a narrow construction with respect to the items which constitute the compensation fund,[28] in other words, the statute is to be liberally construed against the shipowner in respect of what constitutes the "interest" of the owner, or the "value" of the "interest" of the owner, in the vessel,[29] so as to cover what the owners have at risk for the object of adventure.[30]

Ship's stores or equipment. Under the statute, ship's stores on board for the purpose of the voyage have been included in the value of the vessel,[31] but the view has been taken that the whaling equipment, provisions, and supplies of a whaling ship are not within the meaning of the words "ship or vessel," as used in the statute.[32] The court has denied the inclusion of the value of a dummy engine which had not been used and was not intended for use in navigating the vessel;[33] but it has been held that there should be included a traveling steam hoist or derrick which was mounted upon a fuel scow, in respect of which limitation was sought, specially designed to be used with such a hoist, although the hoist had no connection with the navigation of the scow.[34]

Damages incurred or claimed by owner of vessel. The damages recovered or recoverable by the owner from another vessel or her owner for injury to the vessel in collision, in respect of which limitation is sought, constitute an interest in, and stand in the place of, the vessel, and are included in the value which must be surrendered,[35] even though the vessel, in respect of which limitation is sought, is not a total loss.[36] So also the owner's right of action based on alleged negligence which caused a fire on the vessel is to be included[37] However, the owner is entitled to deduct from the amount of such damages the reasonable legal expenses incurred in recovering them.[38]

Insurance. Insurance effected by the owners on the vessel and her freight is not an "interest in such vessel and freight" which they are bound to surrender for the benefit of claimants for injuries.[39]

Cargo on the vessel, which belongs to the owner, is not included.[40]

Several vessels owned by person seeking limitation. Under the federal statute, where only one of several vessels, owned by the same person, is at fault, the general rule is that only the vessel which is at fault is to be included.[41] Where, however, two vessels of the same owner are at fault, the

Landing craft and mother vessel
Where libelant's fishing vessel and tow were damaged by swells caused by landing craft operated in harbor as pool vessel to ferry personnel of navy attack transport, and United States had no contractual or employer-employee relationship to libelant, United States was entitled to limit liability, if any, to value of landing craft notwithstanding craft was assigned to and carried aboard mother vessel as part of its equipment—Goggin v. U. S., D.C.Cal., 79 F.Supp. 812.

owner is liable to the extent of the value of both.[42] While the view has been taken that, where several vessels of the same owner are engaged in a joint operation when an injury due directly to the fault of one occurred, the value of all the vessels is to be included,[43] the correct rule seems to be that the mere fact of joint operation does not necessarily require the inclusion of the value of all vessels of the same owner engaged in the joint operation,[44] the true test being whether or not a particular vessel was at fault.[45] While it has been held that where several vessels in a flotilla are at fault, only the value of those at fault, and not of the entire flotilla, is to be included,[46] it has also been held that under some circumstances a tug and its barges together may be regarded as "one vessel" within the rule,[47] particularly where the claim is for the loss of cargo on one of several barges fastened to a tug, the tug and the several barges together constituting the effective instrumentality selected by the owner for the transportation of the cargo.[48]

c. Computation of Value

(1) In general
(2) Determination as of what time and place
(3) Additions and deductions

(1) In General

Where an owner elects to retain his vessel, the extent of his liability is governed by the appraised value of the vessel, as determined by market value, or by other methods in the absence of market value.

Where the owner who seeks to limit his liability elects to retain the vessel and to pay into court, or to give security for the appraised amount or value of such vessel, as discussed infra § 248, the appraised value or amount governs in determining the extent of liability if liability is shown.[49] In arriving at the value of a vessel for limitation purposes, if the vessel has a market value, that value, ordinarily, is the one to be taken,[50] or it is, at least, entitled to considerable weight,[51] and the market value is to be determined by such factors as contemporaneous sales of comparable vessels[52] Where, however, a vessel has no real market value, as such, other methods of arriving at value must be used[53] While the cost of reproduction at the date of valuation ordinarily may be considered,[54] it is not the sole determinant,[55] and certainly book value and reconstruction cost out of all proportion to the market value may properly be disregarded.[56]

The price received by the owner at a sale of the vessel has been taken as the measure of liability in the absence of a showing that the price was not fair and reasonable;[57] and where the vessel in question was abandoned to the underwriters, after standing, the amount realized by the underwriters from the sale of the wreck has been regarded as the proper measure of the value of the ship for the purpose of the act.[58] Valuations placed on a vessel in transfer tax proceedings and related transactions may properly be disregarded.[59]

Reason for rule
Such figures are not realistic, for it must be generally recognized that a valuation for tax purposes is motivated by quite a different rationale than that which governs a market appraisal of the thing damaged.—The Russell No. 5, supra.

(2) Determination as of What Time and Place

The value of the owner's interest in the vessel is taken as it exists after the loss, that is, as of the time when and place where the voyage was terminated or broken up.

The value of the owner's interest is taken as it exists after the loss[60] The exact time of estimating the value of the vessel is the termination of the voyage on which the liability is incurred or the loss is sustained, in respect of which the limitation of liability is sought.[61] If the ship is lost at sea or the voyage is otherwise broken up before arriving at the port of destination, the voyage is considered as terminated, for the purpose of fixing the owner's liability, at the time of her loss[62] or of the breaking up of the voyage.[63] So if the vessel is sunk or stranded, and the voyage thus terminated before the actual end of the trip, the owner's liability is measured by the value of the vessel in her sunken[64] or stranded[65] condition; and, where the vessel was destroyed by fire, the scrap value of the vessel at the place where the fire occurred is to be taken for limitation purposes.[66] So it has been held that, where a vessel was disabled in a collision, the measure to be used is her value in her disabled condition at the place of collision notwithstanding she is subsequently taken to a place of safety by salvors;[67] but there is authority for the view that, in this connection, where a vessel was disabled, but reached her place of destination, with the aid of salvors or others, and delivered her cargo,[68] or part of her cargo,[69] the voyage terminated when she arrived at that place within the meaning of the foregoing rules.

Notice of termination of voyage. Where a vessel returns to port because of damage to the ship, it has been held that the shipowner may, with respect to the claim of the owner of the cargo which was also damaged, terminate the voyage at any time after he discovered he was entitled to limit his liability,[70] by giving the cargo owner notice of his abandonment of the voyage,[71] thereby fixing the time at which the value of the vessel will be determined for limitation purposes;[72] and the shipowner is not required to increase the value of the ship, by making repairs, before declaring the voyage terminated.[73]

Delay or failure to transport cargo. A cargo owner's measure of damages for delay or failure, on the part of the United States, as the owner of a vessel, to transport cargo has been held to be limited to the value of the vessel at the time the libel is filed.[74]

(3) Additions and Deductions

Whether there should be added to the value of a vessel the added value due to salvage services or repairs, or whether there should be deducted from a subsequent sound value the expense of salvage or repairs, depends on the time and place of the termination of the voyage. Outstanding liens have not been deducted in determining the value of the owner's interest.

In view of the fact that value is to be determined at the time and place of the termination of the voyage, the determination of the question as to the inclusion in the value of the added value due to salvage services or to repairs, or as to the deduction,

Reason for termination

Where cargo owner seeks to recover damages to cargo in excess of value of vessel damaged by fire, vessel owner's termination of voyage is not ineffective merely because owner states that action is taken pursuant to bill of lading rather than for purpose of claiming limitation of liability —Rice Growers Ass'n of Cal v. Rederiaktiebolaget Frode, supra.

from a subsequent sound value, of the expense of salvage or repairs, depends on the time and place of such termination.[75] Thus the liability of the owner of a vessel which sank before the destined termination of the voyage, whose liability is measured by the value of the vessel in her sunken condition, is not extended or increased by the fact that the vessel is raised and repaired;[76] and it has also been held that the value of a stranded vessel is not affected by the result of any subsequent salvage operation, whether undertaken by the owner or others.[77] Although there is authority to the contrary,[78] it has been held that there must be deducted, from the value of the vessel, after being brought into port in her disabled condition, the expense of salvage,[79] and also an allowance for the risks affecting the probability of her rescue.[80] Certain other deductions have been refused;[81] but, where the knockdown or junk value is taken as the basis of value, the total value of the material contained in the vessel, less the total expense of breaking her up and getting the material out, is the proper method of valuation.[82]

Liens. The view has been taken that outstanding liens are in general not to be deducted in determining the value of the owner's interest.[83]

Determining value of repairs. In a proceeding for limitation of liability arising out of an accident which occurred a long time before the proceeding, deductions from the present value of the vessel on account of additions made since the accident should be made at their present value, and not at their cost, in appraising the value at the time of the accident.[84]

Absence of evidence as to valuation of parts. A separate allowance for spare parts, added to the value of the vessel, is required to be deducted where there is no evidence of valuation of such parts.[85]

d. Freight Pending

Under the provision of the federal statute limiting the liability of the owner of a vessel to the value of his interest therein and freight then pending, the phrase "freight then pending," which should not be given a narrow construction, means the earnings, of the voyage on which the liabilities in issue arose, as of the time when the voyage terminated or was broken up.

As to what is "freight" or "freight then pending," within the meaning of the federal statute, 46 U.S C.A. § 183 a, which provides that the liability of an owner, entitled to the benefit of the act, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending, the view has been taken that, notwithstanding the general rule that the statute is to be given a liberal construction favorable to the shipowner, discussed supra § 239, the term should not be given a narrow construction,[86] and that in general the word "freight" means earnings.[87] It includes fares for passengers[88] and the earnings of the vessel in transporting the goods of her owner.[89]

In determining the meaning of the phrase "freight then pending," such provision is to be treated as in pari materia, and to be construed, with the provision of the act for the apportionment of compensation among various claimants,[90] and, as so construed, means the freight pending for the voyage on which the liabilities involved in the limitation proceeding arose;[91] and, in accordance with the rule as to the time as of which value is to be determined, the freight pending includes the earnings as of the termination of the voyage or the time when the voyage is broken up[92] Accordingly, the words "freight pending" include freight,[93] including passage money,[94] prepaid at the port of departure, which the owner need not refund, as well as all freight subsequently earned,[95] and it includes also freight earned at the end of the voyage for cargo on board at the time of a collision,[96] and also demurrage due at the termination of the voyage[97]

Salvage Freight pending ordinarily does not include salvage earned during the voyage,[98] but where the salvage service is the sole purpose of the voyage it has been held that the value of the salvage services is to be included.[99]

Whaling or fishing voyage. While the view has been taken that there is not any "freight pending" on a whaling voyage, within the meaning of the act,[1] it has been laid down that, in the case of a fishing vessel, the season's cruising is to be counted as a single voyage, and the earnings for the whole season's fishing are, equally with the vessel, liable for debts contracted on the vessel's account.[2]

Different vessels earning freight. The fact that a vessel of the same owner has earned part of the freight on a through shipment does not require such owner to account for more than that share of the freight which was earned by the vessel at fault;[3] but where the vessel at fault is capable of earning the freight the facts that the cargo was transferred to another vessel of the same owner and that delivery was made by such vessel do not relieve the owner from accounting for the freight so earned.[4]

Part interest in freight. Where a vessel is sailed by the master, who is not one of the owners, on half shares, the interest of the owners in the freight, which must be surrendered, is one half of their interest in the freight[5]

Deductions. Since the interest of the owners in a vessel and her freight then pending is intended to include their entire interest or investment in the adventure, they are not entitled to make any deduction from the gross amount of freight[6] and passage money[7] pending, on account of any expenses incurred for the voyage; or any deduction for ex-

Tug towing several barges
Where barge towed by tug sank with cargo, owner's liability for "freight then pending" was limited to what sunken barge would have earned under charter-party if voyage had been completed, and did not include earnings of tug arising from towing of other barges to their destination in flotilla.—Hockley v. Eastern Transp Co, D C Md, 9 F.Supp. 411.

penditures for provisions or for wages of the crew,[8] except extraordinary expenses, if any, which were incurred after the disaster for the purpose of earning the freight, which latter may be deducted from the gross freight earned to arrive at the value of the freight within the meaning of the act.[9] Accordingly, the owner may not deduct from passage money the amount given by him to passengers, after the disaster, which the owner was under no obligation to give to them.[10]

e. Interest

In general, whether interest is payable on any amount due from the owner seeking limitation depends on the circumstances of each case, and rests largely in the discretion of the court passing on the matter.

Except as the rule may be affected by an admiralty rule providing for the payment of interest,[11] whether or not interest is payable on any amount due from the owner who seeks limitation depends on the circumstances of each case,[12] and rests largely in the discretion of the court which passes on the matter,[13] and, while interest on the limitation value or fund has been allowed,[14] where the petitioner had the use of the vessel during the entire period of the litigation,[15] the fact that the damage claimants were partly responsible for delay in the litigation has been considered in determining the interest period.[16] An owner who surrenders a vessel for the purpose of limiting liability ordinarily cannot be required to add interest on her appraised value from the time the liability was incurred, although he has long delayed the surrender;[17] but, where the owner delayed the filing of his petition and the surrender of the vessel until after a judgment against him in a state court, he has been required to pay interest on the value of the vessel from the date of such judgment[18] as a condition to a restraining order in respect of the proceeding in the state court.[19] Where a shipowner in a suit in personam sets up his statutory limitation of liability in his answer, but the vessel is not surrendered, or an appraisement had or bond given, he may be required to pay interest on the value of the vessel as it was at the time of, or immediately after, the injury sued for.[20]

Stipulation for interest. If a bond is given as a substitute for surrender, the court may properly require the inclusion of a stipulation for interest[21] from its date;[22] and such stipulation for value is binding.[23] In the absence of any provision for interest, in the stipulation or bond, interest on the appraised value has been denied,[24] except that the owners have been held personally liable for interest from the date of final decree until the decision of the appeal therefrom, during which the fund was withheld.[25]

f. Under Carriage of Goods by Sea Act

Under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, liability for any loss or damage to or in connection with the transportation of goods may not exceed five hundred dollars per package, or per customary freight unit, unless the nature and value of such goods have been declared by the shipper, but either party may enlarge his responsibility or waive any immunities he may have under the statute.

Purpose of amendment to admiralty rule providing for appraisement of owner's interest in vessel and giving of stipulation for payment of appraised value by providing for payment of "interest at rate of six per cent per annum from the date of said stipulation" was to take from the courts discretion on question of allowing interest, and to fix a rate of interest and when it should commence to run —The Fairwill, supra.

When interest to begin to run

Under admiralty rule providing for due appraisement of owner's interest in vessel and giving of stipulation for payment of appraised value as substitute for surrender of vessel in proceeding by owner for limitation of liability, "with interest at rate of six per cent per annum from the date of said stipulation," interest should run on amount of the ex parte appraisal from date of the ad interim stipulation rather than from date of the collision, and interest on amount of the adjudicated appraisal should run from date of the stipulation instead of from date of the ad interim stipulation —The Fairwill, supra.

Under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 1304 (5), which has been held to be as much a part of a bill of lading as though physically placed therein by agreement of the parties,[26] neither the carrier nor the ship is liable for any loss or damage to or in connection with the transportation of goods in an amount exceeding five hundred dollars per package,[27] or, in the case of goods not shipped in packages, per customary freight unit,[28] unless the nature and value of such goods have been declared by the shipper before shipment and inserted in the bill of lading,[29] but, under an express provision of the statute, in no event is the carrier to be liable for more than the amount of damage actually sustained.[30] In the case of a disassembled machine, the limitation value may, depending on the manner of packing and shipping, be computed on some parts of the machine as packages, and on other parts as customary freight units.[31]

Either party may enlarge his responsibility or waive any immunities he may have under the statute;[32] and, under a provision of the statute to that effect, a carrier may by agreement fix some amount other than that specified in the statute as its limit of liability, provided such agreed maximum is no less than the figure specified in the statute.[33] It

Particular items regarded as "packages"

(1) Large pieces of machinery which were shipped on skids, not cased or crated, were "packages" within limitation of liability provisions of statute —Middle East Agency v. The John B Waterman, D C.N Y., 86 F.Supp. 487

What constitutes "customary freight unit"

"Customary freight unit," within statute, refers to the unit of quantity, weight, or measurement of the cargo customarily used as the basis for calculation of freight rate to be charged —Waterman S S. Corp. v. U. S Smelting, Refining & Min. Co, supra—The Bill, D C Md, 55 F Supp. 780.

Particular quantities, weights, or measurements

(1) The statute limited a carrier's liability for loss of oil shipped in bulk under a bill of lading specifying freight charges of "$22 per 1,000 kilos" on the basis of $500 for each 1,000 kilograms of oil.—The Bill, supra.

(2) One shipping by steamship a giant amusement crane in 126 pieces, each of which was carefully weighed, measured, and described in schedule attached to clean bill of lading, was not limited to recovery of $500 from shipowner for damages to crane in course of transportation, even though freight charged was lump sum on bill of lading, but each piece was subject separately to such limitation, in absence of showing of custom to the contrary in charging freight on or shipping such cranes —Stirnimann v The San Diego, C C.A N Y, 148 F 2d 141.

(3) Where eleven tractors were shipped uncrated, limitation liability of carrier as to each tractor was $4,270, or 8.54 freight units of 40 cubic feet each multiplied by $500.— Middle East Agency v The John B Waterman, D C.N.Y, 86 F.Supp. 487.

Statute was held inapplicable to loss of structural steel which was not in packages and which was shipped under a bill of lading which did not contain any statement as to value of the merchandise, but which provided for a tariff rate of 64 cents per hundred pounds where $500 multiplied by each 100 pounds of steel would produce a sum far greater than the damages allowed —Waterman S S Corp v. U. S. Smelting, Refining & Min. Co, C C A.La., 155 F.2d 687, certiorari denied 67 S Ct 115, 329 U.S 761, 91 L Ed 656.

No duty to declare value

If shipper is willing to bear the risk of loss in excess of $500 per package, he is privileged to ship at the normal rate, and owes carrier no duty to declare the value of goods and pay a higher rate —Pan-Am Trade & Credit Corp. v. § 243. Liabilities Subject to Limitation

a. In general
b. Particular liabilities or causes of liability

a. In General

The federal statute relating to limited liability extends to liability for practically every kind of loss, damage, and injury resulting from the acts of the master or crew; but each voyage must be treated, in respect of its own particular losses and hazards, as a separate venture.

Subject to the rules as to the privity or knowledge of the owner, discussed infra § 244, the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183 et seq, relating to limited liability extends to liability for practically every kind of loss, damage, and injury resulting from the acts of the master or crew.[35] However, a claim for a tort for which no liability exists against, or in respect of, a vessel is not subject to limitation.[36]

Liabilities arising during single voyage. Under the federal statute, each voyage or trip, each separate journey, must be treated, in respect of its own particular losses and hazards, as a separate venture;[37] and, where the owner has failed to seek limitation in respect of liabilities on certain voyages, he may not include such liabilities in a proceeding in respect of a subsequent voyage;[38] nor may he include liabilities arising after a particular voyage, in respect of which voyage limitation is sought.[39]

b. Particular Liabilities or Causes of Liability

(1) Liability based on contract
(2) Injuries or obligations to, or losses of, employees
(3) Other liabilities or causes of liability

(1) Liability Based on Contract

While the federal statute providing for limited liability permits limitation with respect to debts and liabilities ex contractu, it does not apply to the owner's liability on his own or personal contract; this exception applies to warranties of seaworthiness, whether express or implied.

The federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. §§ 183, 189, applies and permits limitation with respect to debts and liabilities ex contractu incurred without the knowledge or privity of the owner.[40] The statute, however, does not permit limitation of the owner's liability on his own or personal contract,[41] even such as relates to the voyage,[42] and even though the breach of the contract is without the owner's priv-taking to limit maximum liability of carrier to invoice cost is substantially repugnant to statute as applied to case where current market price of cargo at time and place of delivery exceeded invoice cost, but $500 per package greatly exceeded either invoice cost or market price of packages involved—The Steel Inventor, supra.

"The liability that the Act of Congress designs to limit is that which the law imputes to the shipowner by reason of his relation to the ship, her master and crew, not that liability which he voluntarily assumes by express contract"—Petition of Hutchinson, D.C.N.Y., 28 F.Supp. 519, 520.

A shipowner's promise to hospital to pay bills of persons injured on ship was his "personal contract," that is, a contract made by him as distinguished from one imputed to him by law as to liability for acts of others by reason of his ownership of the ship, and as such was not within the protection afforded the shipowner by the statute providing for limitation of liability—Petition of Hutchinson, supra.

Authority of employee to make contract

Company's personal obligations should be determined by authority of one making contract to transact that business, and not by importance of his official positions, and if established routine gives subordinate of transit corporation authority to make personal contract, corporation cannot insist that only more important officials should bind it to personal obligations; accordingly, since employee who accepted order for barge was a "manager" of corporation within rule that contracts of corporate "managers" are personal to corporation, latter was held not entitled to limitation of liability where barge sank while loaded.—The Fred E. Hasler, C.C.A.N.Y., 65 F.2d 589

ity or knowledge,[43] and this rule applies to a contract which the owner has expressly authorized[44] or has ratified.[45] On the other hand, it has been held that the right to limit liability should not be abridged unless by agreement of the person entitled to the benefits of the statute;[46] that, by a "personal contract," as here used, is meant a contract made by the person or corporation to be bound as distinguished from one imputed to such person or corporation,[47] and that the limited liability statute should not be cut down from its intended effect by too liberal an attribution of contracts to owners as personally theirs.[48] Moreover, the view has been taken that the mere fact that the owner personally makes the contract does not prevent the limitation of liability for damage or injury arising from a breach of a stipulation in such contract, not within the owner's privity or knowledge;[49] and that the term "personal contract" has been limited to those of the nature of warranties where the obligation was to be performed by the obligor personally,[50] and does not necessarily include a promise which involves the future conduct of the promisor,[51] or include promises to do acts necessarily performed through the intervention of others.[52] In any event, an owner's personal contract will not preclude his right to limitation of liability where the contract expressly provides that the shipments are subject to the limitation of liability statute.[53]

Warranty of seaworthiness. Under the rule that the statute does not permit limitation of liability on a personal contract, limitation has been held not to be permissible with respect to a warranty of seaworthiness, whether express[54] or implied,[55] and

Where employee had authority to enter into contract to furnish barge, which implied warranty of seaworthiness, owner was bound by such imeven though the breach of such warranty is without the owner's privity or knowledge,[56] since privity and knowledge are imputed to an owner in the case of a personal contract containing an express[57] or implied,[58] warranty of seaworthiness.

Effect of charter. The mere fact that a charterer of a vessel, in respect of which limitation is sought, has by contract assumed a personal responsibility in respect of the claim or damage involved does not prevent the owner from limiting liability.[59]

Part owner. Notwithstanding the provision of the statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 189, which, in a proper case, relieves part owners from liability in solido and which also confines the liability of each part owner to his individual interest in the vessel and her freight, a part owner may not limit his liability to his proportionate share of the debt or obligation,[60] or to the value of his share of the vessel and freight,[61] in the case of liability on his personal contract; and this rule applies to a contract which he has expressly authorized[62] or has ratified,[63] and to a contract entered into by one part owner, acting for all and intending to bind all.[64] On the other hand, it has been held or recognized that the statute applies where limitation is sought by one part owner who was not a party to the contract,[65] or where the contract was made by the master under his general authority to bind the owners;[66] and a part owner may, in a proper case, limit his liability to his share of the vessel where the contract was made by another part owner.[67]

(2) Injuries or Obligations to, or Losses of, Employees

The federal statute permits limitation in liability for injuries to, or losses of, seamen or other employees on the vessel generally; but a claim for wages, or a compensation award, is not subject to limitation

The federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183 et seq, permits limitation in respect of liability for injuries to seamen or other persons employed on the vessel, in respect of which limitation is sought,[68] and, since the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688, governing the enforcement of claims based on personal injury to, or death of, a seaman, did not repeal the statute in so far as such statute permits limitation in respect of such claims,[69] limitation may be had, in a proper case, of a liability, the enforcement of which is sought under the Merchant Marine Act.[70] So also, limitation has been permitted in respect of the loss of the personal effects of the master of a scow.[71]

Wages. By virtue of an express prohibition in the statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 189, applicable to persons employed by the owners, a claim for a seaman's wages is not subject to limitation,[72] and a part owner may not limit his liability in respect of the master's wages,[73] even though another owner, who is owner pro hac vice, is ultimately liable for the whole amount.[74]

Workmen's compensation acts. A shipowner's liability to pay workmen's compensation awards is not subject to limitation, either by virtue of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 33 U.S.C.A. § 948, expressly so providing,[75] or on the theory that liability to pay com-

(3) Other Liabilities or Causes of Liability

The applicability of the federal statute providing for limited liability has been adjudicated with respect to various liabilities.

The applicability of the federal statute providing for limited liability has been adjudicated with respect to various liabilities.[78]

Statutory liability of stockholders. Stockholders of a corporation, to which the vessel involved belongs, may, under the federal statute, limit their direct liability for the debts and liability of the corporation, imposed on them by state constitutional provision;[79] and the effect of the statute in this respect may not be avoided on the theory that their liability under such constitution is an independent one voluntarily assumed by contract.[80]

Nonmaritime torts The federal statute with respect to limited liability extends to an owner's liability for nonmaritime torts, committed without the privity or knowledge of the owner,[81] and the constitutionality of the statute in this respect has been upheld.[82] The limited liability legislation does not, however, extend protection against loss occasioned by the contact of the vessel with a pile structure, constructed by the owner of the vessel, attached to the land but extending into navigable waters without due precautions to guard against accidents, in the absence of any neglect or want of care on the part of those on the vessel.[83]

Sunken vessel; obstruction of navigation. The right to limit liability arising from the sinking of a vessel, which results in obstructing navigation, has been recognized or upheld.[84] So the right of an owner of a vessel, which had sunk and was an obstruction to navigation, to limit liability in respect of an action by a state or municipality to recover the cost of raising and removing the vessel, has been recognized where the owner had not assumed liability in the matter,[85] notwithstanding a state statute or municipal ordinance imposes the cost of removal on the owner.[86] The right to a limitation of liability applies to a claim for damage to realty by reason of the failure to remove a sunken vessel from land under water,[87] even though the case is not an admiralty cause and is tried in a state court.[88]

Improper navigation. Under the statute, in general, the owner may limit his liability in respect of damages or injuries resulting from faults of navigation of those in charge of the vessel.[89]

Collision. The right of a person, otherwise entitled, to limit liability in respect of loss or damage arising from collision includes loss or damage to cargo on the vessel, as to which limitation is sought,[90] damage to other vessels[91] and their cargoes,[92] and personal injuries,[93] including death,[94] suffered by a passenger as a result of a collision, caused in part by the negligence of the officers of the vessel of the carrier.[95]

Personal injuries and death. The limited liability statute permits limitation in respect of personal injury,[96] and injuries resulting in death,[97] notwithstanding the statutory provisions as to apportionment among claimants and as to the transfer to trustees of the interest in the vessel and freight apparently refer to injuries to, and loss of, property.[98] Where an action is brought under the statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 764, providing that, whenever a right of action is granted by the law of any foreign state because of death by wrongful act on the high seas, such right may be maintained in an appropriate action in admiralty in the courts of the United States without abatement in respect of the amount for which recovery is authorized, notwithstanding United States statutes to the contrary, the limitation of liability statute does not apply.[99]

Injuries to, and losses of, passengers. The statute permits limitation in respect of liability for personal injuries to passengers,[1] including personal injuries resulting in death,[2] whether the liability is based on the general admiralty law or on a federal or a state statute.[3] Likewise limitation in respect of loss of baggage is permitted by the act.[4] However, in cases coming within the provision of the statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 491, providing for the liability of the owner for the full amount of damage to passengers or their baggage on steam vessels, resulting from neglect or failure to comply with statutory provisions for insurance of the safety of such vessels, or from certain known defects, the right to claim limitation in respect of injuries to, or death of, passengers, or in respect of loss of, or injury to, their baggage has been denied.[5] Nevertheless, such statute in terms imposing full liability does not affect limitation in respect of claims for personal injuries, including injuries resulting in death,[6] or for loss of, or injury to, baggage,[7] involving conditions to which such statute does not apply, and a like rule applies in respect of the statute rendering an owner liable if the person in command of a steamer navigating a river elects to proceed after a warning that further navigation is unsafe.[8]

Loss of, or injury to, property on vessel. The right to limit liability has been held to apply to cases of loss of, or injury to, property,[9] such as cargo on the vessel.[10] The statute also applies in respect of an unjustifiable sale of cargo by the master in a foreign country after his vessel has been condemned as unseaworthy.[11] Notwithstanding the owner of a vessel may not claim exemption from liability under the statute providing, in substance, that no owner of a vessel shall be liable for any loss or damage which may happen to any merchandise on board such vessel, by reason or by means of fire happening to, or on board, the vessel, unless such fire is caused by the design or neglect of such owner, discussed supra § 129, the circumstances may be such as to permit limitation, under the limited liability statute, in respect of loss of, or damage to, cargo by fire on the vessel.[12]

Liability of tug for injury to, or loss of, tow and cargo of tow. The statute permits the limitation of the liability of the owner of a tug for the loss of, or injury to, the tow,[13] or the cargo on the tow,[14] as where the injury or loss resulted solely from negligence of employees of the owner, in charge of the tug.[15] The liability of the owner of a towing company for negligence in furnishing an incompetent tug for a towing job, thereby causing loss, is such a liability as comes within the statute providing for limitation of liability,[16] notwithstanding no negligence is claimed on the part of the tug or anyone on board at the time of the collision,[17] since the negligence of the owner should be imputed to the tug, which would thereby be an offending vessel to be surrendered, and within the statute.[18]

In view of the fact that, by the terms of the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183 a, the limitation of liability is provided for in respect of acts, matters, etc., done, occasioned, or incurred without the privity or knowledge of the owner, limitation may not be had if the owner is chargeable with privity or knowledge within the meaning of the statute.[19] Accordingly, where the owner received notice that a vessel had broken adrift and was causing damage, he has been held not to be entitled to the limitation of liability as to the damage done after such notice.[20] Where, however, the act or omission which causes the loss is without the privity or knowledge of the owner, he is entitled to the limitation of liability;[21] and the owner of a boat operated by another is entitled to limitation of liability even though the damages were occasioned by the fault or negligence of the operator, provided the incident giving rise thereto was without the privity or knowledge of such owner.[22] In fact, the owner of a boat operated by another is entitled to exoneration from all liability for damages occasioned without fault or negligence on the part of the operator.[23]

Liberal construction of statute. The general rule that the statute should be construed liberally in favor of the owner who seeks limitation in order to effectuate the purposes of the statute, discussed supra § 239, has been applied in determining whether or not the damage or injury occurred with the privity or knowledge, or resulted from the personal fault, of the owner.[24]

Personal fault or neglect of owner. Since the liability limited by the federal statute is an imputed liability,[25] that is, a liability imputed by law by reason of the ownership of the vessel,[26] the owner remains liable without limitation for his own fault or neglect,[27] or, as discussed supra § 243 b (1), for his own contracts. In other words, the statute applies only when the owner of the vessel is sought to be made liable for the fault of some person other than himself.[28] In fact, it has been held that it is the purpose of the statute to protect the owner from the consequences of the acts, contractual or tortious, of the master, crew, or agent, when the vessel is not under his control,[29] or from the consequences of accidents and disasters not due to his personal neglect or default,[30] and not to protect him from the consequences of his own acts or neglect.[31]

What constitutes "privity or knowledge" generally. In the phrase "privity or knowledge," as used in the federal statute, "privity" has been defined as some personal participation of the owner in the fault or negligence which caused or contributed to the loss or injury,[32] and "knowledge" has been defined as some personal knowledge or means of knowledge of which he is bound to avail himself of a contemplated loss, or of a condition of things likely to produce or contribute to the loss, without adopting appropriate means to prevent it.[33] Such "knowledge" or "privity," in order to defeat the right to limit liability, must be not merely constructive but in a measure actual,[34] that is, actual, in the sense of knowledge or authorization, or immediate control of the wrongful acts or conditions, or through some kind of personal participation in them;[35] and the necessity for the presence or existence of personal concurrence or participation,[36] or of personal knowledge or means of knowledge,[37] has frequently been asserted. Negligence of itself does not necessarily establish the existence on the part of the owner of a vessel of privity or knowledge,[38] although, it has been said, there may be negligence which will[39] Privity like knowledge turns on the facts of each particular case.[40]

"Privity" or "knowledge" of corporation. A corporation may be charged with "privity" or "knowledge,"[41] or what may be regarded as its personal fault,[42] which will prevent limitation under the statute, by the acts or knowledge of its managing officers, as considered infra subdivision b of this section. On the other hand, the corporation may be without privity or knowledge of conditions and so entitled to the benefit of the statute.[43]

Causes of damage or injury. The privity or knowledge which will defeat the right of limitation must be in respect of a matter which actually contributes to the damage or injury in respect of which limitation is sought;[44] and the rule applies in respect of an alleged personal default of the owner.[45] Accordingly, privity or knowledge in respect of certain negligent acts does not defeat limitation where other negligent acts were the sole proximate cause of the loss or injury;[46] but where the privity or knowledge is in respect of a matter which is a concurrent, and not the sole, cause, limitation may not be had.[47]

Rights and status of part owner. There is authority for the view that the knowledge or privity of one part owner is not necessarily the knowledge or privity of another part owner, under the statute,[48] and also that a part owner, notwithstanding his privity or knowledge, is liable only for that proportionate share of the total liability which his individual share bears to the whole.[49]

Question of law and fact. The question as to the existence of privity or knowledge is primarily a question of fact.[50]

b. Persons Acting for Owner Generally

The knowledge, privity, or fault which will preclude limitation of liability by an owner may be that of some one having general authority to act for him and bind him, as in the case of officials of a government agency acting for the government, or the managing officers or agents of a corporation.

While it has been held that the knowledge or privity which will defeat the right to limitation must be in a measure actual, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, it has also been held that the knowledge of a fault is not required to be actual,[51] but may be imputed if someone in charge for the owner had general authority to act for him and by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered the fault.[52] In other words, the scope of authority delegated by an individual owner to a subordinate may be so broad as to justify imputing privity to the owner for the acts or knowledge of such subordinate.[53] Thus, it has been held that the negligence or knowledge of the partner of the owner is imputable to the owner and within the privity or knowledge of the owner so as to preclude the limitation of liability.[54]

On the other hand, knowledge will not be imputed to the owners of a vessel seeking limitation of liability unless such knowledge is by one who can bind his principal.[55] Thus, mere negligent acts or omissions of the owner's agents or employees are insufficient to fasten unlimited liability on the owner;[56] and the privity or knowledge of an ordinary sailor, agent, or employee as a general rule will not be imputed to the owner.[57] Moreover, the

Officials of government agency. The privity and knowledge of the officials of a government agency may in a proper case be chargeable to the government.[62]

Officers, agents, or employees of corporation. In the case of a vessel owned by a corporation, the "privity," "knowledge," or fault of a managing officer or agent of the corporation may be the "privity," "knowledge," or fault of the owner within the meaning of the statute, and sufficient to prevent limitation;[63] and, in this connection, the corporation is charged with knowledge of what the managing officer or agent should have known had he exercised due diligence.[64] While it has frequently been laid down in broad terms that the "privity" or "knowledge" which will defeat a corporation's right to limit liability must be the privity or knowledge of the managing officer or officers,[65] or of some managing officer or agent,[66] the test apparently is the extent of the authority of the person with whose "privity," "knowledge," or fault it is sought to charge the corporation;[67] and it is not necessary that such person should be a chief executive officer of the corporation,[68] or, according to some cases, even a corporate officer in the technical sense.[69] In any event, however, the "privity" or "knowledge" imputable to the corporation must be that of the managing officers or supervising agents of the corporation,[70] or someone entitled to represent it in the premises;[71] and, usually at least, the "knowledge" or "privity" of ordinary servants, employees, or agents,[72] including a master of a vessel,[73] is not sufficient to prevent limitation. So a corporation is chargeable with knowledge of the existence of defects, or becomes privy to acts of negligence causing them, only when persons representing the corporation in such capacities as to speak for it are guilty of some negligence or omission to maintain the vessel in a seaworthy condition.[74]

c. Seaworthiness, Equipment, and Manning

A shipowner may not limit his liability for injury or damage caused or contributed to by his failure to furnish a seaworthy vessel, properly equipped, and properly manned, where such deficiency existed with his privity or knowledge, but the owner has the right to delegate such duty to a competent person.

Even in the absence of any question as to the breach of an express warranty of seaworthiness by the owner, discussed supra § 243 b (1), the general rule is that an owner may not limit his liability arising from unseaworthiness which existed with his privity or knowledge within the meaning of the statute,[75] and the restriction on the right of limitation extends to liability for the owner's personal failure to furnish a vessel which is seaworthy[76] and properly equipped.[77] Thus, it has been held that, in order to permit limitation for liability arising from unseaworthiness or improper equipment, it must appear that the owner exercised due diligence to furnish a seaworthy vessel[78] or proper equipment,[79] and that his failure to exercise due diligence to ascertain the condition of the vessel is sufficient to defeat limitation.[80] However, it has also been held that the statute does not make the exercise of due diligence in making the vessel seaworthy a condition of the right to the limitation of liability,[81] since it refers to the right to immunity under the Harter Act, as discussed supra § 127. In this connection, where the unseaworthy condition of a vessel would be shown by a proper examination,[82] or where serious structural defects had existed for an extended period,[83] her owner is ordinarily chargeable with knowledge of her condition. Moreover, it has been held that if the shipowner knew of some defect or characteristic of the ship which would affect the manner in which it would be operated, his failure to disclose such fact may preclude his claiming limitation of liability for damage caused as a result thereof.[84]

On the other hand, the right of the owner to limit liability, in cases other than those involving express warranties, has been recognized or upheld where the unseaworthiness was not within the privity or knowledge, and was not the personal fault, of the owner,[85] and, where the owner has exercised due diligence to provide a seaworthy vessel, he may claim the benefit of the statute[86] where a loss afterward occurs, without privity or knowledge on his part, from some secret defect in the ship or its equipments, which could not have been discovered or avoided by the exercise of due care on his part.[87] So, if the vessel is in a condition, when she sails, to encounter the ordinary perils of her voyage, this is sufficient to make her seaworthy, so that if loss is due to the mistake or carelessness of the captain, without the fault, knowledge, or privity of the owners, the latter are entitled to limitation of liability.[88] However, it has been held that even though the unseaworthiness develops after the ship has left her home port limitation of liability may be precluded on the ground of privity or knowledge, where the facts constituting the defect were made known to the owner and the owner could have communicated with the vessel.[89] Failure to make proper use of equipment furnished, in the course of a voyage, is regarded as a fault of the crew and not of the owner and does not prevent limitation of liability in respect of such failure.[90] So, where the duty to furnish certain equipment has been regarded as that of the master, the right of the owner to limit liability arising from a violation of such duty has been recognized.[91] The mere fact that a vessel is old fashioned and antiquated does not make it unseaworthy so as to bar limitation of liability.[92]

Failure to furnish a sufficient crew, in respect of which the owner is chargeable with privity or knowledge, may be ground for refusing limitation,[93] and the owner is in privity with a loss which occurs by reason of failure to exercise due care in selecting a competent master and crew and his failure is ground for refusal of limitation.[94] If, however, the owner exercises due care in the selection of the master and crew and a loss subsequently occurs without actual privity or knowledge on the part of such owner, through the negligence of the master or crew, the owner's liability may be the subject of limitation,[95] notwithstanding it appears

Motor boat owner was entitled to have his liability, for injuries sustained by individual who was struck by petitioner's boat while it was being operated by petitioner's minor son, limited to value of boat, notwithstanding operation of boat had been intrusted to boat owner's thirteen and one-half year old son, where son was experienced and thoroughly trained operator and there was no basis for finding or imputing negligence of son to boat owner—Rautbord v. Ehmann, C.A.Ill., 190 F.2d 533.

after the event that the master did not possess sufficient knowledge to enable him to avoid the danger which he encounters[96] Moreover, the absence of the master or pilot or some other competent person from the vessel without the privity and knowledge of the owner will not prevent limitation of liability,[97] notwithstanding such absence constituted negligence on the part of the vessel,[98] and the accident might not have happened had such person been on board.[99] While it has been held that the owner of barges, who knew or should have known that notwithstanding his instructions to the contrary barge captains were likely to leave their barges at night, may not claim limitation in respect of loss or damage resulting from the fact that a barge captain left his barge,[1] the failure to have men on board, or in certain parts of, the vessel does not of itself prevent limitation where such failure was not the fault of the owner and he was not privy to, and had no knowledge of, such fault,[2] and did not violate any duty of the owner.[3]

Expert knowledge. The owner, in order to discharge his duty in respect of seaworthiness, equipment, and manning, so that he may limit his liability, need not acquaint himself with the science of navigation or acquire expert knowledge concerning the vessel or its equipment or manning, nor need he designate a person as an intermediary between himself and the master, who has such knowledge.[4]

Part owners. While part owners of a vessel may be chargeable with privity or knowledge in respect of failure to procure and equip a seaworthy vessel so as to prevent limitation of their liability,[5] the fact that a part owner or owners are so chargeable does not prevent limitation of liability by part owners who are not chargeable with privity or knowledge.[6]

Cause of damage or injury. The right of limitation is not defeated by the fact that the owner is privy to, or has knowledge of, some defect or default in respect of equipment or seaworthiness, where such defect or default did not contribute to the damage or injury in respect of which limitation is sought[7] On the other hand, unseaworthiness, in respect of which the owner is chargeable with knowledge or privity, will prevent his claiming the benefit of the limitation act although it is merely a concurrent and not the sole cause of the damage or injury.[8] Similarly, the fact that the vessel was temporarily shorthanded, with the knowledge or privity of the owner,[9] or that there was a failure to have men on board, or in certain parts of, the vessel,[10] will not preclude limitation where such fact did not in any way cause or contribute to the damage or injury.

Delegation of duty. In the absence of an express warranty of seaworthiness, the right of the owner to delegate to a competent person his duty to inspect a vessel or to render her seaworthy,[11] to provide the proper equipment,[12] or properly to man the vessel,[13] without the owner's losing his right to limit his liability, in respect of loss or damage resulting from the failure of the person so selected properly to perform his duty, has been recognized. In this connection, however, due care must be exercised in the selection of a competent agent,[14] and the owner may be personally charged with a loss resulting from the incompetent act or omission of an agent, so as to prevent limitation, where the owner failed to exercise due care in the selection.[15]

d. Management and Navigation; Deviation; Fire

Faults in respect of the operation of the vessel, including faults of navigation are not ordinarily regarded as the personal fault of the owner and he is not usually chargeable with privity or knowledge thereof so as to prevent limitation of liability An owner who directs or is chargeable with privity as to deviation may not claim limitation.

Where the owner has performed his duty as to furnishing a competent master and crew, faults in respect of the operation of the vessel,[16] including faults of navigation,[17] are not ordinarily regarded as the personal fault of the owner, and the owner is not usually chargeable with privity or knowledge of such faults[18] so as to prevent limitation of liability under the federal statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 183 et seq.

It has been stated in broad terms that in order to warrant holding an owner personally at fault for a master's error in navigation at sea, so as to prevent limitation, it must appear either that the owner was in reality in command of the vessel,[19] or that the negligent acts were ordered or directed by him,[20] and the mere fact that the owner is aboard,[21] or that he is master of,[22] the vessel, does not make him privy to, or charge him with knowledge of, a fault causing a collision, so as to prevent limitation. The mere fact that the owner does not issue special instructions for the navigation of his vessel does not prevent limitation of liability arising from improper navigation;[23] and an owner who has performed his duty in respect of the selection of a competent master and crew, has given proper instructions in respect of rules for the operation and navigation of the vessel, and has not knowingly encouraged or tolerated a violation of such instructions and rules, may limit his liability for loss or damage resulting from a violation of such instructions and rules.[24] However, the failure of the owner to give certain instructions, and enforce their obedience, with respect to a dangerous device aboard the vessel may preclude the owner

Where river tug owner placed captain in complete charge and relied on captain's best judgment, fact that improper manner of placing lookout according to custom known to owner contributed to collision was held not such "privity or knowledge" by owner as to prevent limitation of liability—The G. K. Wentworth, C.C.A.Or., 67 F.2d 965.

from claiming limitation of liability as to damage caused as a result thereof.[25]

While there is authority apparently to the contrary,[26] the view has been taken that the owner's knowledge of the master's custom negligently to navigate his vessel may charge the owner with privity and knowledge in respect of the master's negligent act, in accordance with such custom, which resulted in loss or injury;[27] and, in general, where a negligent practice is frequent and long-continued the owners may be chargeable with knowledge of it.[28] Knowledge of the owner of an intended negligent act of the master may prevent limitation in respect of loss or injury resulting from such negligence of the master;[29] and a like rule, preventing limitation, applies where the owner directs or performs a negligent act[30] or where by wireless he controls the method of rescuing a stranded vessel,[31] and of transferring the passengers from such vessel.[32] In a proper case, permitting a ship to go out on its regular trip in dangerous weather may be a fault precluding a limitation of liability,[33] and, under some circumstances, this may be so even though the owner had instructed his pilot to avoid pressing forward under the specified conditions.[34]

Delegation of duties. Where the owner of a vessel has properly delegated duties with respect to her management to a competent person, something more is required in establishing knowledge and privity as to violations of statutes or regulations than mere negligence as to discovering whether or not those duties have properly been carried out;[35] and some degree of actual knowledge or participation must be brought home to the owner.[36]

Cause of injury or loss. The fact that the owner is chargeable with privity or knowledge in respect of certain negligent acts of the master does not prevent limitation of liability where other negligent acts of the master, in respect of which the owner is not chargeable with privity or knowledge, were the proximate cause of the loss or injury.[37]

Deviation. An owner who directs,[38] or who otherwise is chargeable with privity in respect of,[39] an unlawful deviation may not claim limitation in respect of the resultant loss or damage; but the privity or knowledge of one part owner, in respect of a deviation, does not prevent another part owner from claiming the benefit of the act[40]

Fire on vessel causing loss of, or injury to, merchandise. In respect of limitation of liability for the loss or destruction of cargo by fire the courts have distinguished between the phrase "privity or knowledge" as used in the act providing for limitation of liability, and the word "neglect" as used in the statute exempting the owner from liability for loss or damage to merchandise on the vessel, caused by fire happening to or on the vessel, unless such fire is caused by the design or neglect of the owner;[41] and the view generally taken is that, notwithstanding the negligence of the owner which would prevent his obtaining the benefit of the last mentioned statute, he may be without "privity or knowledge" and therefore entitled to the benefit of the limited liability act.[42] However, the limitations may not be allowed where the owner is not without "privity or knowledge" within the meaning of the limited liability act.[43]

§ 245. Proceedings to Obtain Limitation

a. In general
b. Purpose of proceeding; affirmative claim
c. Number and amount of claims

a. In General

Proceedings for the limitation of a shipowner's liability are entirely statutory; but details of the procedure are regulated by supreme court rules.

Proceedings for the limitation of the liability of a shipowner are entirely statutory.[44] The statutes do not contain provisions, complete in all details, for the method of procedure by which the benefit of the limited liability act may be claimed,[45] and the supreme court has, in the exercise of its powers, promulgated rules regulating the procedure,[46] which rules a district court is bound to obey.[47] The rules are not intended to restrict the rights of persons claiming the benefit of the limited liability act but to aid them.[48]

It has been held that a determination of the right to limit liability should not be allowed outside the limitation proceedings,[49] particularly at the instance of an owner who invoked the proceeding for his own benefit,[50] but with this holding should be contrasted holdings as to the right to claim limitation by answer in a suit to enforce a claim, as discussed infra § 254 b, and it has been held that an owner may, if he chooses, forego his remedy of having the extent of his liability decided exclusively in a limitation proceeding.[51] The right of damage claimants to bring suits in state courts cannot operate to deprive the vessel owners of the right to limit their liability for losses comprehended within the federal statute.[52]

A proceeding to limit liability does not presuppose any preëxisting res of which the court is to take possession;[53] the res is created by the petitioner,[54] particularly when he does not surrender the vessel to a trustee for sale, but posts a stipulation for her value.[55]

Under the admiralty practice, a libelant bringing limitation proceedings cannot set up against the United States, in the proceedings, an affirmative claim for the libelant's collision damages,[56] even though he has to defend in such proceedings the claim of the United States for its own collision damages.[57]

A proceeding to limit liability may be maintained either where the libel is in rem against the vessel[58] or where it is in personam against the owner,[59] and the fact that no property has been attached in libels by certain damage claimants does not prevent limitation in respect of these claims where such libels assert claims against the vessel involved.[60] It is not necessary, however, that suits or actions in admiralty to enforce damage claims should have been commenced in order to authorize the maintenance of a proceeding to limit liability in respect of such claims.[61]

What law governs. The procedural steps in an action for limitation of liability are governed by the law of the forum;[62] the statutes permitting limitation are regarded as relating to remedy, and the law of the forum controls.[63] In a proceeding to limit the liabilities of the owner and the charterer of a vessel arising out of a collision in foreign waters between their vessel and a vessel of another foreign country, where the limit of liability differs under United States law and that of the country in whose waters the collision took place, the question of what law governs the substantive limit of liability should be determined in advance of proof of individual claims.[64] In a proceeding by a ship-

Time of determining applicable law
In action for exoneration from, or limitation of, possible liability arising out of steamship fire in Canada, a determination of whether Canadian or American law was applicable was not required to be made prior to filing of claims, where it was likely that there would be a trial on issue of right to limitation, and question of what law should apply would be determined at such trial before proof of damages, and maximum amount for which company would be liable was greater under Canadian than under American law.—Petition of Canada S S. Lines, supra.

owner of one foreign country for limitation of liability for a collision with a vessel of another foreign country in territorial waters of the former country, the substantive rights of the parties are governed by the law of the former country.[65] In such a proceeding, where the two countries have adopted the Brussels Convention, recourse to that law is proper in order to ascertain the quantum of damages permitted in connection with the wrong involved.[66]

In a proceeding in admiralty by a shipowner seeking limitation of liability for injuries from an explosion, on the ground that it resulted solely from the negligence of the injured persons' employer as an independent contractor, the law of the state in which the explosion took place, while the vessel was in drydock, has been held to govern.[67]

Parties. The right secured to a corporation shipowner to limit its liability and the corresponding right in the stockholders as to their several personal liabilities do not include the right in either to compel the other to become a party to a federal limitation suit;[68] and the corporation is not a necessary party to such a suit brought by the stockholders to limit their personal stockholders' liabilities.[69]

Bond not required of United States as owner Under the statutes governing proceedings in admiralty, the United States, as the owner of a vessel involved in a collision, is not required to give a bond as a prerequisite to securing a limitation of its liability.[70]

b. Purpose of Proceeding; Affirmative Claim

The purpose of the proceeding, in addition to limiting the owner's liability to the true value of his interest in the vessel, is to marshal all claims, or bring them into concourse, and settle every dispute in one action.

The purpose of the limitation proceeding is to limit the liability of the owner to the true value of his interest in the vessel;[71] but the purpose is not merely to limit liability,[72] but to bring all claims into concourse and settle every dispute in one action.[73] The statutory proceeding is intended and designed for the marshaling of all claims against the vessel and owner,[74] and for the purpose of their complete and final disposition, whether limitation ultimately is or is not granted.[75]

The prevention of a multiplicity of suits has been held to be one of the reasons for the institution of a limitation proceeding.[76] On the other hand, it has been held that the purpose of limitation proceedings is not to prevent a multiplicity of suits,[77] but, in an equitable fashion, to provide a marshaling of assets and the distribution, pro rata, of an inadequate fund among claimants, none of whom can be paid in full.[78]

c. Number and Amount of Claims

Limitation of liability may be had in a proceeding therefor even though there is only a single damage claim. The petition will not lie where the amount of the claim or claims is less than the value of the vessel or freight, or the owner's interest therein, but will lie where there is a probability or possibility of claims exceeding such value.

While in some cases the right to maintain a separate or independent proceeding to limit liability where there is only one claim has been denied,[79] on the ground that in such case the benefit of the statute may be taken by defense in an action on the claim,[80] it is now well settled that the limitation may be had in a separate or independent proceeding for that purpose even though there is only a single damage claim,[81] provided it is large enough,[82] notwithstanding the related statutory provisions as to apportionment and the transfer of the interest in the vessel and freight to a trustee apparently contemplate a plurality of claims.[83]

Amount. It has been held or recognized that a single claim for an amount less than the value of the petitioner's interest in the freight or cargo will not authorize a petition for limitation,[84] and, where the aggregate amount of the claims is concededly less than the value of the vessel and freight, a petition to limit liability will not lie[85] merely to bring all claims into concourse and thus to avoid a multiplicity of suits.[86] A petition to limit liability will lie, however, where there is a probability, or possibility, of claims in excess of the value of the vessel and freight,[87] or in excess of the fund available for the satisfaction of the claims,[88] or even, it has been held, unless it appears beyond question either from the petition or elsewhere, that the aggregate of the claims is less than the value of the vessel and freight.[89]

§ 246. —— Form and Nature of Proceeding

A proceeding for limiting liability is sui generis, and essentially equitable; it may partake of the character of suits in personam and in rem.

The owner of a vessel may maintain a separate or independent proceeding to claim the benefit of the federal statute providing for limited liability,[90] and a proper method to claim such benefit is by libel or petition filed in the district court by the owner,[91] although, as discussed infra § 254 b, the right to claim the benefit of the statute by answer in a suit to enforce a claim has been recognized. A proceeding by one damage claimant in behalf of all to obtain the relief afforded by the act may be maintained.[92]

A proceeding for the limitation of liability is sui generis.[93] It is not a determination of a cause of action,[94] but is merely a determination of whether or not the petitioner is entitled to limit his liability for causes of action which have been adjudicated,[95] it is to discover whether or not an owner or a charterer is entitled to the benefits of the statute.[96] While a proceeding to obtain the benefit of the limited liability act is not strictly an action in rem, but partakes rather of the character of a suit in personam,[97] and is not an action against the vessel and her freight except when they are surrendered to a trustee,[98] where the petitioner for limitation has filed a stipulation for value, the jurisdiction of the admiralty court attaches both in rem and in personam by reason of the res put into the hands of the court by the petitioner.[99] The statute provides a method by which damage claimants may be brought into concourse,[1] and the proceeding by petition or libel to limit petitioner's or libelant's liability is essentially an equitable proceeding,[2] partaking of the features of a bill to prevent or enjoin multiplicity of suits,[3] a bill in the nature of an interpleader,[4] and a creditor's bill or suit.[5] The proceeding for limitation of liability has been declared different from the ordinary admiralty suit[6] in that in such proceeding the court of admiralty has power to grant an injunction and by way thereof to bring into the admiralty court litigants who do not have claims which are strictly admiralty claims.[7] Limitation proceedings are not merely auxiliaries to the distribution of an inadequate fund among a number of claimants.[8]

8. U S —Curtis Bay Towing Co v. Tug Kevin Moran, Inc., C.C.A.N. Y., 159 F.2d 273.

The privilege of limiting liability is granted the owner of an offending vessel on condition that he surrender the value of his interest in the vessel and her freight then pending.[9] So, in a separate or independent proceeding for limitation of liability, the vessel at fault and her pending freight must be surrendered,[10] or, as discussed infra § 248, the value paid into court or a stipulation therefor given; but in order to claim the limitation by answer in a suit or action by damage claimants against the owner it is not necessary to surrender or abandon the vessel and freight[11] or, as discussed infra § 248, to pay the proceeds or value into court.

The right of surrender or transfer under the provision of the limited liability act, 46 U.S C.A. § 185, that it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the act, if the owner shall transfer his interest in the vessel and freight, for the benefit of damage claimants, to a trustee appointed by the court, may be exercised by the owner notwithstanding his interest in the vessel and freight may have been diminished in value by the collision or other casualty during the voyage[12] or may be a total loss.[13] The fact that the owner, after the collision and before surrendering the vessel to a trustee, replaces the steering wheel and part of the steering gear is not ground for dismissing the petition for limitation.[14] The power of the trustee to enforce a claim for damages in favor of the owner who seeks limitation, transferred to the trustee for the benefit of the damage claimants in the limitation proceeding, has been recognized.[15]

A charterer, in order to limit his liability, must surrender the vessel and freight pending at the end of the voyage, or their value.[16]

b. Form and Sufficiency

(1) In general

(2) Several vessels of same owner

(1) In General

Actual transfer of the vessel is not essential, but the equivalent thereof, as by payment of the value of the owner's interest into court or giving a stipulation therefor, may be acceptable. The transfer must be of the owner's interest as of the time of completing the voyage during which the injury occurred.

Notwithstanding the statutory provision for the transfer, for the benefit of damage claimants, of the vessel and freight, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, the operation of the act is not confined to cases of actual transfer in accordance with the express terms of such provision,[17] but includes cases in which what is required or done is equivalent to such transfer;[18] and under one of the admiralty rules it is optional with one who seeks to limit his liability either to surrender the vessel and freight to a trustee appointed by the court, or, as directed by the court, to pay into court the appraised amount or value of his interest in the vessel and freight or to give a stipulation with surety for such amount or value.[19] In case of total loss, no formal abandonment is necessary to entitle the owners to the benefit of the act[20] One who seeks limitation is required to surrender only his own interest in the vessel.[21]

Claim of owner for damages. An owner who seeks limitation of liability must assign to the trustee, for damage claimants' benefit, a right of action against a shipwright for negligence causing injury to the vessel, out of which injury the liability of the owner arose[22]

red,[23] and, according to one view, free from liens accruing prior to such voyage.[24]

Time for surrender or transfer. The statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 185, and Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., have been construed as requiring the surrender or transfer to be made within six months after a claimant shall have given the owner of the vessel written notice of claim.[25] The transfer must be of the interest of the owner as of the time of the completion of the voyage during which the injury or loss in respect of which limitation is sought occurred,[26] or, if there is no voyage, within a reasonable time,[27] and there is not a compliance with the statutory requirements if, at the time of the attempted surrender, the vessel is less valuable than she was on the date as of which surrender should have been made.[28] Subject to the foregoing rules, the right to surrender is not lost by a mere delay in making the surrender[29] or by giving a stipulation for value in a suit in rem against the vessel,[30] and she may be surrendered before or after a verdict settling the responsibility for the claim in respect of which limitation is sought.[31]

(2) Several Vessels of Same Owner

A person seeking limitation of liability must surrender all of his vessels which were at fault for the particular damage or injury involved.

A vessel of an owner who seeks limitation of liability, which was not at fault, need not be surrendered merely because such vessel was involved in the occurrence from which the liability arose[32] or because she was in the vicinity.[33] On the other hand, all vessels which are owned by the person who seeks to limit his liability and which were at fault for the particular damage or injury involved must be surrendered.[34] In some cases the view has been taken that vessels engaged in the same operation, under one common direction, are to be treated as one vessel and that all must be surrendered,[35] and a like rule, requiring the surrender of both vessels where one of such vessels wholly depends on the other for propulsion, has been recognized;[36] but there is authority for the view that the mere fact that the offending vessel depends on a tug for propulsion does not require the surrender of the tug.[37]

The vessels which are to be surrendered are those devoted to the performance of the contract at the particular time when the fault which causes the loss is committed;[38] so all the vessels used successively in performing a contract are not to be deemed collectively one vessel for purposes of surrender.[39]

c. Control and Custody, and Effect of Failure to Surrender

The court may, by its process or order, secure or seize a vessel or wreckage involved in limitation proceedings.

The court may direct the marshal to take the vessel and wreckage into his custody,[40] and where shipowners who have invoked the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty by a petition to limit their liability, and have secured a stay of proceedings by libelants, surrender but one of two vessels held by the court to be liable, the court, having full equitable powers to adjust the rights of all parties interested, is not bound to dismiss the proceedings for that reason, but may, by its own process, or its own order, seize the other vessel and make distribution of the entire fund which it was the duty of the petitioners to tender by their petition.[41] Failure to surrender pending freight to the trustee does not necessitate a refusal to allow limitation of liability, where there is an honest controversy as to whether there was any pending freight to be surrendered and there is no question as to the solvency of the owner.[42] Where the petitioner contumaciously refuses to put the court in actual or constructive possession of the fund to be distributed, it seems that relief may properly be withheld, and the petition for limitation of liability dismissed.[43]

§ 248. —— Stipulation for Value or Payment into Court

a. In general
b. Amount
c. Appraisement

a. In General

A stipulation for the value of the owner's interest in the vessel and freight, or payment of such value into court, is a sufficient compliance with the limitation of liability statute.

A stipulation for the appraised value of the owner's interest in the vessel and freight, in respect of which limitation is sought,[44] or the payment into court of such value,[45] is equivalent to the transfer which, under the terms of a provision of the limitation of liability act, is a compliance with the act, as discussed supra § 247, and a stipulation stands in the place of the vessel and her freight,[46] although the statute provides in terms only for the transfer of the vessel, the validity of a stipulation, in accordance with the admiralty rule, as a substitute for the surrender of the vessel is beyond question.[47] In order to claim the limitation by answer in a suit or action by damage claimants against the owner, it is not necessary to pay the proceeds or value into court,[48] or, as discussed supra § 247, to surrender or abandon the vessel and freight. A plaintiff suing a shipowner in a state court and recovering judgment cannot sue on, or have recourse to, the stipulation previously filed by the shipowner in proceedings for the limitation of liability brought by him in the federal court.[49]

Time for deposit. The statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 185, and Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., have been construed as requiring the deposit to be made within six months after a claimant shall have given the owner of the vessel written notice of claim.[50]

Filing an ad interim stipulation pending due appraisement, although not specifically provided for in the Admiralty Rules, is authorized practice.[51]

Irrevocable election. An owner who, after due appraisement of the vessel, gives a stipulation for the payment of its value cannot thereafter elect to transfer the vessel.[52]

Where several persons seeks to limit their liability it is not required that the stipulation should be to answer for any liability or default which may be found against any of the petitioners.[53]

b. Amount

The amount of the stipulation, depending on the value of petitioner's interest, ordinarily is determined by the value of the vessel at the end of the voyage during which liability occurred. Value, for the purpose of payment into court, may be determined by appraisement, sale under court order, or fair private sale by the owner.

The amount for which the stipulation is given depends on the value of the petitioner's interest, determined by rules set forth supra § 242, which measure the extent of petitioner's liability, and ordinarily the amount is determined by the value of the vessel at the end of the voyage during which the liability accrued.[54] The preferable methods of determining value, for the purpose of payment into court, are by appraisement[55] or by sale under order of the court;[56] but these methods are not exclusive,[57] and the price obtained on a fair, private sale by the owner may be taken as the correct amount.[58] Under one of the admiralty rules, where a vessel has already been libeled and sold, the proceeds represent the vessel for the purposes of such rules, but the price realized at a marshal's sale of the vessel, although prima facie fixing the value for which a stipulation will be required,[59] is not conclusive,[60] and the court, on cause shown, may require a stipulation for the fair value as proved.[61]

Limitation sought by several persons. Where several persons, who have distinct interests, seek to limit their liability in respect of the same vessel, each should be required to give a stipulation for, or to pay into court, where one of these methods of transfer is selected, the amount of the value of his several interest,[62] but no more.[63]

c. Appraisement

An ex parte appraisement of the amount or value of an owner's interest is not void, and may be sufficient for some purposes, although not for others; and a reappraisement may be ordered. The claimants may waive appraisement.

Under Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., which provides for an appraisement of the amount or value of the owner's interest in the vessel and freight, in respect of which limitation is sought, as a preliminary to an order for the payment of such amount or value into court, or for the giving of a stipulation for such amount or value, the appraisement is a substitute for a sale.[64] Notice to damage creditors of an appraisement is not necessary, and an ex parte appraisement is not void,[65] and such ex parte appraisement, and the taking of the stipulation thereupon, are, at most, irregularities which the district court can correct.[66] So an ex parte appraisement has been held sufficient to constitute an election barring petitioner from surrendering the vessel to a trustee,[67] but not such a due appraisement as to relieve petitioner of the burden of going forward with evidence of the value of his interest in the vessel and her pending freight.[68] It has also been held that an ex parte appraisement constitutes due appraisement only if the parties are given an opportunity subsequently to be heard,[69] so that the court has power to order a reappraisement on motion therefor by a claimant,[70] and "due appraisement" has been held intended to mean an appraisement made on a reference or in some other formal way which would give all interested parties an opportunity to be heard.[71] A prior appraisement of the vessel in connection with claims in respect of which limitation is sought, and the giving of a stipulation, pursuant to which the vessel was released, do not prevent a reappraisement in the limitation proceeding.[72] The court may, under certain conditions, adopt the valuation of the vessel made in a prior suit against the owner who seeks limitation,[73] and the damage claimants may waive an appraisement[74] and acquiesce in the shipowner's statement of the value of the vessel and the freight.[75]

§ 249. —— Time for Commencing Proceedings; Waiver or Loss of Right

a. Time for commencing proceedings
b. Waiver or loss of right

a. Time for Commencing Proceedings

Under the statute a petition for limitation of liability must be filed within six months after a claimant gives the owner written notice of a claim. In order to start the running of the period, the notice must be such as to inform the owner of the claimant's intention to look to the owner for damages, and must be notice of a claim of a kind subject to limitation of liability.

The owner of a vessel may, before he is sued, institute appropriate proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction in order to obtain the benefit of the limited liability act.[76]

Prior to the amendment of 1936, 46 U.S.C.A. § 185, whereby the owner of the vessel is required to file his petition for limitation of liability within six months after a claimant shall have given to, or filed with, such owner written notice of a claim, no time limit existed for bringing such a petition,[77] the owner might wait until after judgment was had against him,[78] and it was held that, after suit brought on certain claims, the owner might maintain proceedings to limit liability in respect of such claims until decree or judgment therefor was satisfied.[79]

The purpose of the amendment was to cut down the rights and privileges of the owner,[80] by setting a time limit where none existed before,[81] and to require him to act promptly if he desires to limit his liability.[82] A petition not filed within the time so permitted by law will be dismissed,[83] since in such circumstances the admiralty court is without jurisdiction.[84] Likewise, a proceeding has been held not timely commenced where the petition, although filed in time, is not accompanied by a deposit of a sum equal to the owner's interest, or approved security, or a transfer of such interest to a trustee, but merely asks the court to act, as to such matters, "upon further application of the petitioners."[85]

The statute should be given a reasonable interpretation.[86] While notice of claim need not be in any particular form,[87] and no statutory form of claim or notice of claim is required,[88] the notice must be such as to inform the owner of the claimant's intention to look to the owner for damages.[89] Mere knowledge of an accident, on the part of the owner of a vessel,[90] or information given orally by

Effect on rights at time of enactment

Failure of congress, in enacting statute, to make exception with respect to existing rights, raised strong presumption that congress intended to make no exception. Ruling that six months' period ran from passage of statute, where claim was filed prior to enactment of statute, did not give statute retroactive effect, since limitation did not divest vested rights but merely limited time within which existing rights could be asserted.—The Fred Smartley, Jr., C.C.A.Va., 108 F.2d 603, certiorari denied S. a third person,[91] or even by a claimant,[92] likewise does not start the running of the statutory period; but the filing of a libel does,[93] as does the commencement of a suit in a state court.[94]

A notice which starts the running of the period must be notice of a claim of a kind subject to limitation of liability,[95] in other words, in order that a notice of claim may be effective, under the statute, it must be made by one who claims damages for something for which the owner of the vessel may possibly limit his liability in accordance with the limitation statute and the admiralty rules[96] On the giving of notice of a claim, the statutory period starts running as to all claims arising out of the particular accident;[97] and an owner who fails to file his petition within six months after receiving notice of the first claim loses the right of limitation as to all subsequent claims as well, even though he files within six months after receiving notice of such subsequent claims.[98]

Affidavit of ownership. Where an owner files a petition for limitation within the statutory period, the fact that his affidavit of ownership is not filed within that period does not invalidate the petition.[99]

Laches. On the issue of laches, the shipowner is not required to claim limitation of liability until a liability on his part is established.[1]

b. Waiver or Loss of Right

The right to claim limitation of liability may be waived; but various acts, omissions, or delays on the part of the owner of the vessel, such as delay in instituting the limitation proceedings or in surrendering the vessel, have been held not to constitute, or result in, such waiver or loss.

The right to claim limitation of liability is a personal one which may be waived by the person entitled to claim the right,[2] and this rule applies to a part owner[3] The owner does not, however, waive or lose his right to maintain a proceeding to limit liability merely by delay in surrendering the vessel,[4] by failing to institute such proceeding until after the commencement of actions in personam[5] or in rem[6] to enforce claims, in respect of which limitation is sought, or by contesting liability in such actions,[7] even though there are final judgments or decrees for plaintiffs, after trial or hearing on the merits,[8] in actions either in personam[9] or in rem,[10] at least where the question as to limitation was not raised or litigated in the prior action[11] An owner or charterer, by failing to claim limitation by answer to a suit in a state court, does not waive the right to bring a proceeding for limitation in the federal court after judgment against him, for damages, in the state court,[12] notwithstanding there is only one claimant[13] So also, the owner does not waive or lose the right to claim limitation by giving Shipowner's promise to hospital to pay bills of persons injured on ship and subsequent letter by hospital to shipowner requesting payment of such bills was not notice of claim by a claimant under the statute, since liability on promise to pay bills was not liability which could be limited under statute, and hence hospital was not a claimant.—Petition of Hutchinson, supra.

an undertaking or stipulation for the release of the vessel in a suit in rem against her[14] or by giving a supersedeas bond on appeal.[15] Proceedings for a limitation of liability, if not instituted until after a party has obtained satisfaction of his demand, are ineffectual as to him,[16] but the delay of the petitioner in this respect does not affect his rights as to limitation in respect of claims which have not been satisfied.[17]

A stipulation for the introduction of evidence of certain facts and for limitation on the introduction of evidence of other facts, in an action which might be brought in a state court against the owner, which contains nothing to prevent the presentation of any defense or the owner's proceeding to limit his liability, does not prevent a subsequent proceeding by such owner to limit his liability.[18] A bill of lading issued by a railroad company providing that if any part of the property shall be carried by water such carriage shall be subject to the conditions in the bill of lading, and providing also that no carrier shall be liable for loss or damages by causes beyond its control or by fire, does not operate to prevent the application of the limitation of liability act when the property is destroyed by fire on a barge.[19]

§ 250. —— Jurisdiction and Venue

a. In general
b. Foreign vessel
c. Method of acquiring jurisdiction
d. Loss or ouster of jurisdiction
e. District in which proceeding brought

a. In General

A proceeding for the limitation of a shipowner's liability is exclusively within the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court; such jurisdiction extends to all matters properly involved in the proceeding, and to the giving of complete relief.

The operation of the limited liability act, which, as appears supra § 239, is a part of the maritime code of the United States, is coextensive with the territorial operation of the general admiralty and maritime jurisdiction[20] and applies so as to give jurisdiction to the admiralty court notwithstanding the injury sued for happened within the technical limits of a county of a state,[21] or that the liability, enforcement of which is sought, arose from a state statute[22] or from the law of a foreign country.[23] The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as courts of admiralty may properly be invoked where limitation under the act is sought by petition or libel,[24] and admiralty has exclusive jurisdiction of such a proceeding.[25] Original jurisdiction of admiralty in respect to this matter is exercised by the district court,[26] and, under the Jurisdiction in rem and in personam

The jurisdiction of the admiralty court attaches in rem and in personam by reason of the custody of the res put by the petitioner into its authorities, this jurisdiction is exclusive[27] in respect of all matters properly involved in the proceedings,[28] and where the necessary basis of jurisdiction exists it is the duty of the district court in admiralty to take jurisdiction.[29] On the other hand, where a condition precedent to the right to invoke the benefits of the statute has not been met, the admiralty court is without jurisdiction;[30] and it has been held that where a damage claimant objects to the jurisdiction of the court in the limitation proceedings and has elected to proceed in another forum to enforce his claim, the jurisdiction of the district court in the limitation proceedings depends on the right of the petitioner to limit his liability.[31] Where the jurisdiction of a court is assailed in a motion to dismiss incorporated in the answer, the decision must rest on the allegations of the petition as amended.[32]

Necessity that damage claims be within jurisdiction. While the view has been expressed by the supreme court of the United States that the district court cannot take jurisdiction in admiralty of a petition for limitation of liability where it would not have cognizance in admiralty, originally, of the cause of action involved,[33] the decision appears to have been limited by a case decided after the amendment of the limited liability act extending its operation to claims for nonmaritime torts;[34] and the jurisdiction of the district court of a petition or libel in admiralty to limit liability in respect of claims for nonmaritime torts is now recognized.[35] There is, however, authority for the view that if a damage claim has by federal statute been exempted from the operation of the limited liability act and, therefore, is not within the jurisdiction of the court in a limitation proceeding, the lack of jurisdiction may not be waived or cured by consent.[36]

ceeding for the limitation of liability, has jurisdiction to do equity to claimants by affording a complete remedy regardless of limitation.[37] So, where an admiralty court has taken jurisdiction and brought all claimants into concourse, in denying a petition for limitation of liability, it should give complete relief,[38] the court should proceed to adjudicate all claims in the manner of a court of equity and render judgment both in rem and against the owner in personam.[39]

b. Foreign Vessel

Admiralty courts have jurisdiction of a proceeding to limit the liability of a foreign vessel.

The admiralty courts of the United States have jurisdiction of a proceeding to limit liability in respect of the alleged liability of a foreign vessel,[40] even though such liability arose out of an occurrence on the high seas[41] or in the territorial waters of a country to which neither of the vessels involved belonged.[42]

c. Method of Acquiring Jurisdiction

Filing a libel or petition for limitation, with the offer of a stipulation for value, confers jurisdiction of the proceeding.

In general, the filing of a libel or petition for limitation by the owner, with the offer to give a stipulation for value, confers jurisdiction of the proceeding,[43] and surrender of the vessel and the pending freight and the issuance of monition give the court jurisdiction of the property or funds,[44] but not, it has been held, of persons holding claims.[45] It is not necessary to the jurisdiction of the district court, however, that all the requirements of Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., be met,[46] or that the court should have possession of the vessel or her proceeds, or of a fund representing the proceeds, over which the court has obtained control through the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction.[47]

d. Loss or Ouster of Jurisdiction

Duly obtained jurisdiction has been held not ousted or lost by, or because of, various subsequent developments, such as subsequent irregularity of procedure.

In general, the question as to the jurisdiction of the court in respect of a proceeding to limit liability must be determined by the jurisdictional facts as they existed at the time the court assumed jurisdiction.[48] Accordingly, where the court has duly obtained jurisdiction, such jurisdiction is not ousted or lost by, or because of, any subsequent irregularity of procedure,[49] the fact that a damage claimant takes issue with what is alleged in the petition,[50] a subsequent reduction of the amount of the claims to an amount not in excess of, or less than, the appraised value of the vessel and freight,[51] or a recovery by a claimant of less than the stipulated value of the vessel, where his original claim was greater than its value.[52] So the district court does not lose jurisdiction by allowing a vessel, after the giving of a stipulation for her value under the admiralty rule, to go into another district in the ordinary course of her business.[53]

Jurisdiction to determine claims. When the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty has attached through a petition for limitation, the jurisdiction to determine claims is not lost merely because the owner of the vessel fails to establish his right to limitation.[54]

e. District in Which Proceeding Brought

Provision is made in the admiralty rules with respect to the district in which limitation proceedings should be brought.

Apart from any rule on the subject, any district court having custody and control of a vessel, or having it within its district so that custody can be acquired by its process, has jurisdiction of proceedings by the owner for limitation of liability.[55] Under the Admiralty Rules, rule 54, 28 U.S.C.A., the owner is required to bring a proceeding to limit his liability in the district court where the vessel has been libeled to answer for a loss or damage in respect of which limitation is sought.[56] Where the vessel has been libeled in several districts, for different claims arising from the some occurrence, a petition for limitation of liability may be filed in either district,[57] unless the libel in the district in which limitation is sought was filed collusively and merely for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction of the limitation proceeding.[58] While the propriety of bringing the limitation proceeding in the district in which the owner has been sued, if no libel has been filed against the vessel, has been recognized,[59] there is a conflict of opinion as to whether, in such case, the limitation proceeding must be brought in the district in which the owner is sued. According to one view, the limitation proceeding must be brought in the district in which the owner is sued, if he be sued in a federal court and in only one district,[60] but, in other cases, without recognizing any distinction based on the particular court, state or federal, in which a prior action or prior actions were brought, or the bringing of actions in several districts, the right of the owner to bring the limitation proceedings in the district where the vessel may be,[61] or in the district where the action against the owner has been brought,[62] has been recognized. Where the vessel has not been libeled and an action against the owner has not been brought, the proceeding may properly be instituted in any district where the vessel may be.[63]

Wrecked or stranded vessel. A district court has been held without jurisdiction of a proceeding to limit the liability of the owner of a vessel sunk in a collision, where the owner of the other vessel does not sue but merely petitions for limitation of his own liability in that district,[64] since a petition for limitation of liability is not a suit within the admiralty rule authorizing such a petition where a ship is not libeled in any district in which the owner may be sued.[65] Likewise, a district court has been held to have jurisdiction where substantially all the strippings and wreckage of a wrecked vessel, together with the proceeds of the sale of her gasoline tanks, are brought into the district before an action for damages was commenced, although a small portion of such strippings and wreckage remains in another district.[66] The proceeding may be instituted in a district where a fund or claim equitably representing the lost vessel, in respect of which limitation is sought, is in litigation, although the petitioners reside in another district.[67] Prior to the amendment of the admiralty rule in 1889, and when the rule provided only for cases in which the vessel was libeled or the owner was sued, it was held that the district court of the district in which a vessel was stranded and the wreckage was had jurisdiction, where no libel had been filed or suit brought,[68] and where a vessel was sunk and no action was brought by damage claimants, it was held that a district court of a particular district could entertain jurisdiction, where the remnants had been transferred to the trustee appointed by such court.[69]

§ 251. —— Effect on, and Enjoining, Other Proceedings

a. In general
b. Enjoining other proceedings

a. In General

Proceedings to limit liability supersede other proceedings on the claims involved, and the latter proceedings should be stayed.

Proceedings to limit the liability of a vessel supersede other proceedings on claims against the owner or vessel involved in the limitation proceeding;[70] and, on a proper showing of the pendency of the limitation proceedings, such other proceedings should be stayed[71] Where the owner has taken appropriate proceedings to obtain the benefit of the act, a person injured is barred from maintaining a separate action subsequently brought, on a claim to which the limitation act applies.[72]

Annulment and dismissal of other proceedings. The institution of the limitation proceeding does not put an end to other proceedings previously instituted.[73] So the view has been taken that, where there has not been due compliance, by the petitioner for limitation, with requirements as to surrender or stipulation for value, pending proceedings are not necessarily stayed,[74] and there has apparently been a recognition of the right to institute new proceedings pending the filing of the petition for limitation and the surrender to a trustee and the issuance of monition.[75] Proceedings instituted after the commencement of the limitation proceedings[76] and the issuance of an injunction[77] have been dismissed. If limitation of liability is decreed, pending suits or actions on damage claims, which have been stayed, should be dismissed.[78]

Staying limitation proceeding. The question whether a limitation proceeding should be stayed so as to permit arbitration to be had, pursuant to the charter party, rests in the sound discretion of the district court[79]

b. Enjoining Other Proceedings

With some qualifications, injunction may issue against independent proceedings or suits on claims as to which limitation proceedings have been begun. As equity may require, such injunction may be granted on condition, refused, modified, or dissolved.

While the limitation proceeding and monition issued therein constitute in effect a statutory injunction,[80] and it is not necessary that an injunction should issue,[81] an injunction may issue to restrain separate or independent proceedings on claims in respect of which limitation is sought,[82] including suits in a state court;[83] but if only one claim is filed in the limitation proceeding the independent action should not be restrained,[84] since limitation of liability may be obtained by proper pleading in the independent action.[85] Further, an admiralty court having jurisdiction of a limitation proceeding will not, where the right to limitation is shown not to exist, defeat the rights of claimants to proceed in actions in personam where common-law remedies may be applied,[86] so, claimants brought into a limitation proceeding after a determination that they are not subject to limitation should no longer be enjoined from proceeding with their actions.[87] Also, where the aggregate of claims against the owner and charterer is much less than the value of the vessel and pending freight, and, as far as can be seen, there are no additional claims and no reasonable prospect that the fund will ever be exhausted, an injunction against the maintenance of a separate or independent proceeding may be denied.[88]

An injunction granted in proceedings for limitation restraining further prosecution of pending actions for damages is in effect a removal of such actions into the admiralty court,[89] where they are to be considered as continued for all purposes of the statute of limitations.[90]

Refusal, modification, or dissolution of injunction, or conditional injunction. In view of the fact that the proceeding is in effect an equitable proceeding, as discussed supra § 246, the court may refuse an injunction against other proceedings,[91] may grant an injunction on condition,[92] may modify an existing injunction,[93] or may dissolve an injunction,[94] where equity and justice require such refusal, conditional injunction, modification, or dissolution, whether an injunction should be dissolved[95] or modified[96] rests in the sound discretion of the admiralty court.

§ 252. —— Notice and Filing and Withdrawing Claims; Intervention and Bringing in Parties

a. Notice of limitation proceedings
b. Filing and withdrawal of claims
c. Intervention and bringing in parties

a. Notice of Limitation Proceedings

Personal notice of a limitation proceeding to claimants, in the district where it is brought, has not been required, but an ex parte application may be denied where substantial or novel questions are at stake.

It is not necessary, in order to sustain a proceeding to limit liability, that claimants should have been served personally with notice thereof in the district in which the proceeding is brought[97] or that the court should retain possession of the vessel until such claimants appear.[98] A damage claimant in default is not entitled to notice of further steps in the proceeding.[99] On the other hand, an ex parte application by the owner for the limitation of his liability, without notice to claimants, has been denied where substantial questions are at stake and novel questions of law are involved in the application.[1]

Admiralty rules; failure to comply strictly. Admiralty rules relating to the limitation of liability and providing for procedural methods of notice were intended to preserve the rights of persons having actual or potential claims against petitioner,[2] and failure to follow explicitly the provisions of such rules does not, as to those whose rights are in no way prejudiced, denied, or barred, result in the

b. Filing and Withdrawal of Claims

(1) In general
(2) Time for filing

(1) In General

Claims in limitation proceedings must be made by persons competent to sue, and must be sufficiently stated; a claim may be withdrawn on payment of costs.

A claim, in a proceeding for the limitation of liability, has been said to be somewhat similar to a brief libel,[5] and claimant must be competent to sue, whether as a plaintiff or as a libelant.[6] Ownership of a claim based on an absolute assignment has been recognized notwithstanding the assignment was made for purposes of collection.[7] The claims of several claimants may be required to be stated separately,[8] and claims briefly stating that the vessel's negligence caused specified damage to real and personal property, and personal injuries, including loss of wages and amounts expended for medical services, etc., have been held sufficient unless objection thereto is duly made.[9] Ordinarily a damage claimant, who, with notice of the proceeding, fails to present a claim which is within the purview of the limited liability act, may not thereafter maintain a suit to enforce such claim.[10] A claim by the owner of one of two vessels, both of which have been held at fault for a collision, for contribution for liability to a third person may be presented in a limitation proceeding brought by the owner of the other of such vessels, where the liability arose out of such collision,[11] even though such third person has lost his right to present his claim in such limitation proceeding by failure to present it in time.[12] Where a petition for limitation of liability is denied, the interlocutory decree will not bar claimants who were in default in presenting their claims,[13] and they will be afforded the right to apply to excuse the default for good and sufficient cause;[14] but those still in default on the entry of the final judgment will be barred.[15] Where a shipowner is the lessee of a pier on which fire breaks out in cargo discharged from the vessel, claimants for damage to goods on the pier and in lighters awaiting shipment to the vessel must assert their claims in the owner's proceeding for limitation of liability,[16] and may not prosecute a separate proceeding against him as such lessee.[17]

Notice of claim as affecting the time within which an owner may commence limitation proceedings is discussed supra § 249.

Withdrawal of claims. A damage claimant, in a proceeding for limitation of liability, has been held entitled to withdraw his claim on payment of taxable costs.[18] barred by laches, although the courts have discretion to permit late filing.

(2) Time for Filing

The filing of a petition for the limitation of liability does not stop the running of a statute of limitations applying to the filing of claims,[19] and a notice of claim given to the owner of the vessel is not the filing of a claim in the limitation proceedings, with respect to the timeliness of such filing.[20] The filing of a claim may be barred by laches,[21] but where there is no showing that any time limit had been set for presentation of claims and the petitioner himself has delayed the filing of the petition and the taking of evidence for an extended period, the court may properly refuse to sustain the claim of laches of claimants in presenting their claims.[22] The purpose of the amendment of June 21, 1948, to Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., was to prevent default for failure of claimants to file claims.[23] Ordinarily the trial judge has discretion, in a limitation proceeding, to permit the filing of later claims,[24] at least as long as the fund has not been entirely distributed or a final decree entered.[25] So, in such a proceeding, the court has discretionary power to permit the filing of a claim for damages after the expiration of the time fixed in the monition, in a proper case,[26] although a claim ordinarily is to be treated as barred if not presented within the time so fixed,[27] and the burden is on the claimant to prove good cause for the failure to file within the time fixed.[28] Where, after the notice, a damage claimant has elected not to present his claim, the court may refuse to permit a subsequent presentation,[29] and if the proceedings have been terminated, as far as the parties before the court are concerned, by a final decree, the court has no power to reopen the proceedings for the purpose of allowing other claimants, who have not appeared therein, to come into the case and prove their claims.[30] Where the appellate court orders that a judgment dismissing claims provide that it is without prejudice to the filing of claims by representatives properly appointed, the trial court is without discretion to refuse the filing of claims on the ground of the expiration of the monition period.[31]

Enforcement of claims after dismissal of limitation proceeding. The order of the court fixing or limiting the time within which claims may be filed is not a bar to the prosecution of an action within the period limited by statute if the limitation proceeding should be dismissed.[32]

c. Intervention and Bringing in Parties

Intervention has been permitted in limitation proceedings, as has, in some circumstances, although not in others, the bringing in of new parties.

Where the owner of a vessel seeks limitation of liability in respect of a collision in which cargo was lost or injured, the owner of the cargo may intervene in such proceeding to assert a claim against the owner of the other vessel involved in the collision, where the owner of such other vessel has er elects to surrender, should, according to one view, show that his interest, which it is proposed to surrender, is equal in value to the value of the vessel at the end of the voyage involved,[45] and should contain an offer to surrender the pending freight.[46] The petition invites no decision on the claim against petitioner.[47] In view of the fact that limitation may be sought in respect of a single claim against petitioner or libelant in the limitation proceeding, as discussed supra § 245 c, the petition to limit liability and to restrain the prosecution of other actions need not show the existence, or probability of existence, of more than one claim,[48] and the petition need not allege that the claims against the vessel are in excess of her value, in order to found jurisdiction in the district court to entertain the proceeding,[49] nor need it fully set forth all pending suits in respect of matters set forth in the petition and all suits relating to the voyage in question.[50] If there is more than one claim, defendant-owner can confine his aggregate liability on all the claims to the single value of the vessel, or his interest therein, only by the petition prescribed by the statute.[51]

Amendment. The libel or petition may be amended.[52]

Objection. An objection to the petition should be presented in the form of an exception,[53] although objection by motion to dismiss may be recognized.[54] Such an exception is in the nature of a demurrer,[55] and on such exception the allegations of the petition must be taken as true.[56] A court, in passing on an exception to an article of a petition, is concerned solely with the sufficiency of the article as pleaded,[57] and must ignore the factual dispute with respect thereto.[58]

Insufficient petition standing as application for release on bail. Where it has been held that an application made for the limitation of liability of a shipowner to the value of the vessel and freight does not present facts entitling the application to be considered under the limited liability statute, it may nevertheless be treated as an application for release of the vessel on bail, addressed to the ordinary discretion of the court.[59]

Pleading as to nonliability. Where petitioner or libelant reserves the right to contest the question as to liability, he may either answer claimant's allegations, tending to show liability, by a counter statement of facts, consistent with the petition,[60] or he may adopt the allegations of the petition in respect of freedom from liability, for the purpose of the issue.[61]

Withdrawal of petition. Where the charterer of a barge voluntarily filed an answer, claiming limitation of liability, and a cross libel for detention of the barge in a suit in rem for damage to cargo on the barge, his dismissal, without leave, of his cross libel does not have the effect of withdrawing his petition to limit liability.[62]

b. Pleading Limitation by Answer

The limited liability act may be availed of by answer in a suit to enforce a claim as to which the defendant seeks to limit his liability. Under most authorities, the statutory limitation of time for filing a petition for limitation does not apply to an answer pleading limitation as a defense.

The right to claim the benefit of the limited liability act by answer in a suit to enforce a claim in respect of which defendant seeks to limit his liability,[63] even in an action in a state court[64] where there is only one possible claimant and one owner,[65] has been upheld or recognized. Where there is a multiplicity of claims, making the claim for limitation by answer is not ordinarily sufficient to realize the full benefit of the act.[66] When an owner pleads limitation of liability by answer alone, the personal liability on the claim thus answered cannot exceed the value of the owner's interest in the vessel.[67] If there is more than one claim, and defendant-owner uses the answer, instead of the statutory petition, to raise the defense of limitation, he may be held personally liable on each claim to the extent of the value of his ship or his interest in her[68]

Time for pleading limitation. There has been said to be a decided[69] conflict of opinion as to whether the limitation of time provided for in the amendment of 1936, 46 U.S.C.A. § 185, whereby the owner of a vessel is required to file his petition for limitation of liability within six months after a claimant shall have given to, or filed with, such owner written notice of claim, applies to a defense of limitation of liability pleaded by answer in a suit to enforce a claim.[70] According to most authorities, the amendment does not so apply,[71] and such defense may be raised, although the six-months period has expired,[72] the rules of civil procedure for district courts controlling as to the time for filing an answer asserting such defense.[73] So, an amendment to an answer has been allowed, in order to assert such defense, even after the expiration of the statutory period, in the absence of laches,[74] although an amendment has been disallowed, after such expiration, under circumstances constituting laches[75] Other authority has held the six-months time limitation applicable to an answer setting up the defense of limitation of liability.[76]

c. Damage Claimant's Pleading

The pleading of a damage claimant in a limitation proceeding must contain allegations sufficient to meet the claim for limitation.

The pleading of a damage claimant in a limitation proceeding serves two purposes, namely, an answer to the petition, and a claim of liability which will attach to the vessel, if surrendered, or to the stipulation for value.[77] Claimant has a right to file an answer,[78] and may, by suitable allegations and in accordance with the admiralty rules, state facts by reason of which the right to limitation of liability should be denied.[79] It seems to be generally recognized that, in respect of those matters which petitioner or libelant in the limitation proceeding must allege and prove, in order to entitle him to a limitation of liability, a denial in claimant's answer of knowledge or information in respect of such matters is sufficient,[80] and there is authority for the view that, in order to raise an issue as to such matters, no denial in the answer is necessary.[81] Verification on information and belief of an answer alleging foreign law cannot be regarded as an affidavit in proof of such law.[82] While there is authority to the contrary,[83] the view has been taken that a mere positive or general denial of the allegations of the petition or libel as to the essentials of the right to limit liability is not sufficient,[84] and that, where such a denial is made, the answer should contain also allegations of the specific facts which show that petitioner is chargeable with personal fault.[85]

Liability of petitioner. Where petitioner or libelant reserves, in his petition, the right to contest liability, according to some cases, the damage claimant's pleading is in the nature of a libel,[86] must treat the question as to liability independently of the question and pleading as to the right to limit liability,[87] and must state a cause of action,[88] but there is also authority to the contrary.[89]

Right to file pleading. Under Admiralty Rules, rule 51, 28 U.S.C.A., which provides that any person who shall have presented his claim to the commissioner under oath may answer the libel or petition and contest the right of the owner to the exemption or limitation claimed, it has been held that claimant cannot, without so presenting his claim, file an answer,[90] but the right of one cited by monition to file exceptions to the libel or petition, without filing a claim, has been recognized.[91]

Effect of delay in filing. The fact that the answer to the petition was not formally filed with the clerk until the day on which the trial of the issues began is not prejudicial to petitioner where petitioner had long been apprised of the contents of the answer and knew exactly what he would have to meet by way of defense on the trial.[92]

Amendment. The court may permit an amendment of damage claimant's pleading in a proper case.[93]

d. Interrogatories

In accordance with the general rules governing interrogatories in admiralty cases, a petitioner for limitation of liability, or a damage claimant, may be permitted to attach, or propound, proper interrogatories.

Under Admiralty Rules, rule 31, 28 U.S.C.A., petitioner or libelant in a limitation proceeding may attach interrogatories to be answered by a damage claimant,[94] or may be permitted by the court by amendment to attach interrogatories,[95] and a damage claimant may also propound proper interrogatories to support his answer as a claim.[96] Interrogatories must, however, be confined to evidence in support of the case of the party presenting them;[97] and since, as discussed infra § 255 b, the burden of showing lack of privity and knowledge is on petitioner, interrogatories merely dealing with privity or knowledge, and proffered by a damage claimant, should not, in general, be sustained.[98] Interrogatories by a damage claimant should not be sustained where they are not pertinent to the issues,[99] or are not necessary,[1] or are premature.[2]

Answers to interrogatories. A proper interrogatory should be answered directly and not by reference to the petition for limitation or to the ship's log.[3] Whether the answers to interrogatories are admissible, and their legal effect, should be determined by the court at the trial;[4] and on a motion to direct petitioner to answer, it is sufficient if the answers would be permissible under any circumstances that might reasonably arise.[5]

e. Issues or Matters to Be Litigated; Proof and Variance

In proceedings for limitation of liability, the petitioner, in addition to the question of the right to limitation, may litigate the question of any liability, unless it has already been determined. General rules as to variance in admiralty apply.

In addition to the question as to the right to limit liability, which question is necessarily involved,[6] petitioners for limitation of liability may litigate in the same proceeding the question whether there is any liability,[7] provided that question has not already been decided.[8] Where, however, the liability of petitioner,[9] including the amount of the damages,[10] has been determined by a prior judgment or decree which is res judicata, petitioner may not contest his liability in the limitation proceeding; but the question as to privity or knowledge of petitioner, as affecting his right to limit his liability, remains for determination.[11]

Issues between parties other than petitioner. The course of the proceeding may be such as to raise for decision issues between parties to the proceeding other than the owner who seeks to limit his liability.[12]

Proof. It has been laid down in general terms that it is not necessary for petitioner to prove that the claims against the vessel are in excess of her value, in order to found jurisdiction in the district court to entertain the proceeding.[13] A failure to comply with the steamboat inspection law may be invoked to prove that a shipowner is not entitled to a limitation of liability, although it is not set up in the pleading of the parties, to the proceeding for limitation.[14] In respect of whether there is any liability, the view has been taken that claimant is required to prove a cause of action as in an original suit.[15] Where petitioner calls on a claimant to admit certain facts, and after claimant's responses thereto are stricken the case goes on to trial without further response from claimant, both petitioner and the trial court have the right to treat the request as admitted.[16]

Variance. General rules as to variance in admiralty suits, as discussed in Admiralty § 131, apply in a proceeding to limit liability.[17]

a. Presumptions; Res Ipsa Loquitur

General rules as to presumptions in civil proceedings have been applied in limitation proceedings. In a proper case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur will be applied.

General rules as to presumptions in civil proceedings have been applied in proceedings to limit liability.[18] The rule, or doctrine, of res ipsa loquitur has been applied in determining the cause of the injury in respect of which limitation is sought;[19] but the doctrine will not be applied unless the

Seaworthiness

(1) In general —The William Nelson, D C N Y., 296 F 553—58 C.J. p 675 note 30 [a]

(2) The unexplained sinking of a vessel raises a presumption of unseaworthiness —Sabine Towing Co. v. Brennan, C C A Tex, 72 F 2d 490, certiorari denied 55 S Ct 141, 293 U S 611, 79 L.Ed 701, rehearing denied 55 S Ct 212, 293 U S 632, 79 L Ed. 717

(3) The sinking of a vessel while being properly handled, without undue stress of weather or other known external cause, is presumptively due to unseaworthiness.—Petition of Erlandsen, D C.Wash, 51 F Supp 921

(4) Presumption of unseaworthiness arises only when vessel sinks from unknown causes under such circumstances that nothing but unseaworthiness can explain accident —The Carroll, D C Md, 60 F 2d 985 —In re Eastern Transp Co, D C. Md, 37 F 2d 355, modified on other grounds, C C.A., The Calvert, 51 F.2d 494.

(5) Presumption of unseaworthiness at inception of voyage arises in case vessel becomes unseaworthy during voyage, but such presumption may be overcome by evidence showing perils of sea from which it is reasonable to assume that vessel sprang leak —The Carroll, supra

(6) There was no presumption of unseaworthiness of barge when conditions showed contact with some obstruction —In re Eastern Transp Co, supra

(7) Fact that scow capsized in slip in smooth water and without external contact raised presumption of unseaworthiness —The Emergency, D C N Y, 9 F Supp. 484.

Negligence

(1) Unexplained sinking of barge raised presumption of negligence — Flat-Top Fuel Co. v. Martin, C C A N Y., 85 F 2d 39, certiorari denied 57 S Ct 110, 299 U.S 585, 81 L Ed 437

(2) Happening of accident to barge towed by tug did not in itself raise presumption of negligence on part of tug —The Carroll, D C.Md., 60 F.2d 985

Violation of statute

(1) Where a tug left port without a second deckhand and lack was admitted to be a statutory fault, it would be presumed that fault was a contributory cause of collision —The New York Marine No 10, C C A N Y, 109 F 2d 564.

(2) Where vessel owner has privity or knowledge of violation of statutes affecting navigation of vessel, it is presumed that fault is at least a contributing cause to loss.—The E Madison Hall, C C A Md, 140 F 2d 589, certiorari denied 64 S Ct. 1159, 322 U.S. 748, 88 L Ed 1579

(3) Where the statutory three-watch requirement for mates on certain vessels was violated, and the owner was affirmatively found to be privy to the violation, he could not escape application of presumption that violation was cause of wreck, by compelling the injured persons to litigate their claims in a limitation proceeding —The Denali, C C A Wash, 112 F 2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S Co. v. Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S Ct 65, 311 U S. 687, 85 L Ed 444.

cause of the injury is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have management or control of the vessel use proper care.[20]

b. Burden of Proof

A petitioner seeking limitation of liability has the burden of proving his right thereto; a damage claimant has the burden of proving liability and establishing his claim.

On the issue of the right to limit liability, the burden of proof is on petitioner or libelant who seeks limitation,[21] he has the burden of proving compliance with the conditions which entitle him to limit liability,[22] including the burden of proving that the act or omission on which liability is based was without his knowledge or privity,[23] and that the damage was not caused by any fault of his own.[24] These rules apply where the question as to 58 C.J. p. 676 note 33.

Acceptance of affirmative

Where petitioner begins by putting in his proof, he must anticipate what claimant will prove and show himself not to be privy to all possible faults open under the pleadings, and in such case, petitioner accepts an affirmative, but only for as long as claimant has not declared his position.—Southern Pac. Co. v. U.S., C.C.A.N.Y., 72 F.2d 212

Intervening negligence

Petitioners had burden of showing intervening negligence breaking causal connection between collision and loss.—The Algonquin, D.C.N.Y., 6 F.Supp. 644, affirmed, C.C.A., 70 F.2d 335.

Assumption of obligation of common carrier

The burden rests on shipowner who has assumed the obligation of a common carrier to show that the loss was due to an excepted cause and that he has exercised due care to avoid it, not in consequence of his being an ordinary bailee but because he is a special type of bailee who has assumed the obligation of an insurer.—Commercial Molasses Corp. v. New York Tank Barge Corp., N.Y., 62 S.Ct. 156, 314 U.S. 104, 86 L.Ed. 89.

Absence of licensed master

Where a diesel engine tug does not have a licensed master and the facts disclose that, for safe navigation, under particular circumstances, a more powerful tug should have been used, a heavier burden rests on owner seeking limitation than otherwise would, even though such tugs, in particular kind of service involved, are not required to have a licensed master.—The Ruth Conway, D.C.Md., 75 F.Supp. 514, affirmed, C.A., Harbor Towing Corp. v. Parker, 171 F.2d 416, certiorari denied 69 S.Ct. 1050, 337 U.S. 907, 93 L.Ed. 1720.

Chartering of scow

Violations of statutory regulations

(1) Burden of exonerating vessel for violating duty to keep proper lookout was on petitioner.—The Wyomissing, C.C.A.N.J., 72 F.2d 834.

(2) Petitioner for limitation of liability in collision had burden to show that statutory faults could not have contributed to collision.—The Edward E. Loomis, C.C.A.N.Y., 86 F.2d 705.

(3) Burden was on tug to show that violations of statutory regulations dealing with use of searchlight and tow lines could not have been the cause of the collision.—The Ernie Miller, D.C.La., 71 F.Supp. 806.

(4) Burden was on barges to show that violation of statutory regulations by failure to have a full complement in crews could not have contributed to collision, and not whether it did so contribute to it.—Martin Marine Transp. Co. v. U.S., C.A.Va., 183 F.2d 676.

(5) Burden is on petitioner to show that statutory fault of lack of second deckhand was not a contributory cause of collision.—The New York Marine No. 10, C.C.A.N.Y., 109 F.2d 564.

(6) Where owner of vessel has privity or knowledge of violation of the right to limit liability depends on the determination of issues as to seaworthiness[25] or proper equipment and supplies,[26] or as to the competency of the persons who manned the vessel.[27] Where, however, petitioner by his evidence makes out a prima facie case of lack of privity or knowledge, the burden of evidence to show privity or knowledge shifts to the damage claimant;[28] and in certain cases the petitioner's case may be aided by presumptions, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, which will shift to the damage claimant the burden of evidence.[29] Where a vessel whose owner is seeking limitation was plainly at fault in a collision with another, whose owner is also seeking limitation, any doubt should be resolved in the latter vessel's favor, unless it was also at fault.[30]

Value of petitioner's interest. Petitioner in a limitation proceeding must show the value of his interest in the vessel and her pending freight.[31]

Liability. With respect to the burden of proof as to liability, a damage claimant is in the position of a libelant or plaintiff,[32] and has the burden of proving facts to show such liability,[33] or the extent statutes affecting navigation thereof, he must bear burden of showing not merely that fault probably was not, but also that it could not have been, a contributing cause of disaster.—The E. Madison Hall, C C A Md, 140 F 2d 589, certiorari denied 64 S Ct 1159, 322 U.S 748, 88 L Ed 1579

(7) If a ship strands while being navigated by a mate whose hours on watch were longer than safety statute permitted, the burden of proof is on the owner of the vessel privy to the navigation to show that the violation was not a direct or contributing cause to the stranding.—The Denali, C C.A Wash, 112 F 2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S. S Co v Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S.Ct. 65, 311 U S. 687, 85 L.Ed 444

(8) In such circumstances, burden also rested on owner to show that its privity in, and knowledge of, violation of statute could not have contributed to the stranding of the vessel.—The Denali, C.C A.Wash, 105 F 2d 413, adhered to on rehearing 112 F.2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S Co v. Vessel as common carrier

Burden of proving seaworthiness rests on vessel when it is a common carrier or has assumed the obligation of a common carrier.—Commercial Molasses Corp. v. New York Tank Barge Corp, N.Y., 62 S Ct. 156, 314 U S. 104, 86 L Ed 89.

Repairs on old vessel

Where barge is visibly old and unseaworthy, proof by owner that repairs were made several months before sinking and that his carpenter performed minor jobs on boats is insufficient to limit liability—Dexter-Carpenter Coal Co v New York, O & W Ry. Co., D C.N Y., 50 F 2d 270.

Privity or knowledge

(2) If claimants establish causal connection between unseaworthiness of barge and its sinking, burden shifts to owner, seeking limitation of liability, to establish that unseaworthiness was not with his privity or knowledge—The Carroll, D.C.Md, 60 F 2d 985—Petition of Sheridan, D C.Me, 50 F.Supp 779

(3) The burden is on an owner of vessel seeking limitation of liability to prove lack of knowledge or of means of knowledge on his part, or that of his marine superintendent, that his vessel was unseaworthy, so, it is not necessary, in such proceeding, for claimants to prove knowledge or means of knowledge on part of owner that vessel was unseaworthy—The Cleveco, C.C.A Ohio, 154 F 2d 605.

Right to limitation in general

(1) Evidence held sufficient to show that petitioner was entitled to limitation of liability —Rautbord v. Ehmann, C A Ill, 190 F.2d 533—The Yungay, D.C N Y, 58 F.2d 352—The Silvanus, D C La, 56 F.2d 257, affirmed, C C A, Nederlandsche Indische Tankstoomboot Maats v. (2) Evidence held not to warrant limitation of liability.—Martin Marine Transp. Co v. U. S., C A.Va., 183 F.2d 676—Harbor Towing Corp v. Parker, C.A.Md., 171 F.2d 416, certiorari denied 69 S Ct. 1050, 337 U.S. 907, 93 L.Ed. 1720—Austerberry v. U.

escape attention on a fairly good inspection, very slight evidence, on behalf of the petitioner, is sufficient at the outset to cover the element of lack of privity or knowledge,[41] but in respect of patent defects the petitioner must give stronger evidence of want of privity or knowledge.[42] Evidence of prior occasions on which the vessel stranded has little probative effect, and will support no inference of unseaworthiness, without more particular evidence of the causes.[43] Where the vessel, in respect of which limitation is sought, was lost, and there is no evidence as to how the loss occurred, the petitioner, on proving the vessel's seaworthiness, at the commencement of the voyage, is prima facie entitled to limit liability.[44] Proof that a tug was seaworthy, that no officer of the corporation owning it was on board, and that the master was competent makes a prima facie case for limitation of liability for the loss of a barge towed by the tug.[45]

General rules as to sufficiency apply in respect of the sufficiency of evidence bearing on the question as to the privity or knowledge of the petitioner,[46]

(3) Evidence held to justify denial of limitation of liability resulting from loss of vessel and cargo because of fire, on ground that owner's neglect to have vessel in seaworthy condition was proximate cause of fire.—The Sandgate Castle, D C N Y, 30 F Supp 344.

Personal liability or contract of owner

(1) Evidence that collision occurred because tug's master failed to make enough allowance for the tide was insufficient to charge owner of tug personally.—Jacobus Grauwiller Co. v Reichert, C C A N Y, 136 F.2d 904

(2) Evidence held to show that shipping contract was vessel owner's personal contract.—In re Great Lakes Transit Corp., C.C.A.Ohio, 81 F 2d 441

Decision by impressions of witnesses

Limitation of liability must be decided, not by extraneous knowledge or by inferences, but by what the witnesses who are heard and seen by the court say and the impressions that they make on the court.—The Ruth Conway, D C Md, 75 F Supp 514, affirmed, C A, Harbor Towing Corp v Parker, 171 F 2d 416, certiorari denied 69 S Ct 1050, 337 U S. 907, 93 L Ed 1720.

Uncontradicted and not inherently improbable testimony will be accepted by court as true.—The Trenton, D.C N Y, 92 F.Supp 833, affirmed, C C.A., In re O'Brien Bros, 101 F 2d 1017.

Judgment of those at scene of collison has greater weight than critics' opinions after event.—The Algonquin, D C N Y, 6 F Supp 644, affirmed, C C A, 70 F 2d 335.

Positive and negative testimony

Positive testimony of witnesses for tug owner tending to show that towed barge struck some submerged object could not be arbitrarily disregarded because of negative testimony of opposing witnesses that they felt no jar.—New Orleans Coal & Bisso Towboat Co v U S, C C A La, 86 F 2d 53, rehearing denied 86 F 2d 1008, certiorari denied St Paul Fire & Marine Ins Co v New Orleans Coal & Bisso Towboat Co, 57 S Ct. 669, 300 U.S 676, 81 L Ed 881, and Louisiana Nat. Intervening negligence

Evidence warranted finding that master of disabled ship did everything that could be expected in emergency and that no intervening negligence broke causal connection between collision and loss of cargo and personal effects—The Algonquin, C C A N Y, 70 F.2d 335.

Sailing without officer

Evidence held to sustain finding that vessel's sailing with first assistant engineer missing was not a contributing cause of collision, and, hence, did not preclude owner from obtaining limitation of liability.—Southern Pac Co. v. U. S, C.C A N Y, 72 F 2d 212

48. Evidence held sufficient

(1) To establish that damage resulting from collision was not caused or contributed to by fault of owner of vessel.—The Silvanus, D C.La, 56 F 2d 257, affirmed, C C A, Nederlandsche Indische Tankstoomboot Maats v Standard Oil Co, 66 F 2d 113

(2) To establish that faults of speed and course which were chargeable to vessel contributed to collision.—Petition of North Atlantic Transport Co, D C.N Y, 80 F Supp 308

Arbitration before trial of limitation issue

In vessel owner's proceeding for exoneration from, or limitation of, liability to charterer for damage arising from sinking of barge, petitioner's motion for trial of issue of limitation of liability before arbitration of question of petitioner's liability vel non under provision in charter party must be denied—The Ben, D.C. La., 51 F.Supp. 357.

Admission of right to limitation

Where action was instituted in state court to recover for injuries, owner of vessel filed petition in federal court to limit liability, and injured parties claimed that they had a right to a jury trial of their cause, if injured parties admitted owner's right to limit liability they could establish amount of liability in the state court with a jury, but, if they

authority for a different order of procedure where the damage claimant challenges the jurisdiction of the court and it is apparent from the pleading or evidence that petitioner is not entitled to limit his liability.[64] While, where the issue as to liability is involved, the denial of the right to limit liability does not require a dismissal of the proceedings where the damage claimants do not seek dismissal,[65] it has been held or recognized that where the damage claimants object to the jurisdiction of the court in the limitation proceeding and it appears from the allegations of the pleading, or from the evidence, that the owner has no right to limit his liability, the proceedings should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.[66] Where no liability is found, the proceeding is at an end,[67] and the view has been taken that where, in such case, the petition prays for an adjudication that the owner is not liable, the petition should be granted in this respect[68] and not dismissed.[69] While the failure of libelant or petitioner strictly to follow the procedure outlined in the statutory provisions and admiralty rules does not require a dismissal of the petition,[70] where the owner surrendered only one of two vessels owned by him, both of which were at fault for the collision in respect of which limitation was sought, it has been held that the petition should be denied and dismissed.[71] In a limitation proceeding, the court will not determine petitioner's liability and right to limitation before passing on an appraisal of the vessel and stipulation for value and the issuance of monition.[72]

Questions of law or fact. The question whether petitioner is at fault because he permitted the operation of the vessel by his minor child has been held a question of law rather than of fact.[73]

Right to additional security. Claimants brought into a limitation proceeding have been held not entitled to additional security, after a determination that they are not subject to limitation.[74]

Withdrawal of petition. Where petitioner seeks to withdraw his petition for limitation of liability, the proceedings will not be dismissed as a matter of right on his request if it appears that claimant may be prejudiced by such a dismissal.[75]

Findings by court or commissioner. A finding by a court that the cause of accident has been left in doubt means that the evidence as to whether or not a vessel sank because of unseaworthiness was so evenly matched that the judge could come to no conclusion on the issue;[76] although negative in form, the finding is as much a finding as an affirmative one, and is to be respected as such.[77] In considering exceptions to the findings of a commissioner, in a limitation proceeding, such findings are presumptively correct;[78] they are not to be disturbed unless

clearly erroneous,[79] and the party who excepts to the commissioner's conclusions has the burden of proving that he was mistaken therein.[80] A motion to require the commissioner to make certain findings in a proceeding for limitation of liability has been denied, on the ground that the matters were irrelevant.[81] The use of the word "accident" in the report of a special commissioner, where the sole issue before him was the value of petitioner's vessel, has been held not to constitute harmful error.[82]

Reopening proceedings. Where the proceedings for limitation have been terminated, as far as the parties before the court are concerned, by a final decree, the court has no power to reopen the proceedings for the purpose of allowing other claimants, who have not appeared therein, to come into the case and prove their claims.[83] A motion to reopen the proceedings, for additional evidence, should be denied where the additional evidence sought to be adduced after trial is in no sense newly discovered and is not made to appear likely to affect the result, and the failure to adduce it on the trial appears to have been due to the neglect, if not the design, of counsel for the moving party.[84]

Payment of claims; set-off. Where the owner of a vessel involved in a collision seeks limitation of liability, claims against him should not be paid until the collision claim of his vessel has been adjudicated and fixed, so that in case of recovery by him his damages may be set off against the claims of the other vessed;[85] and set-off has likewise been permitted in other circumstances.[86]

b. Determination of Merits of Claim

Where liability is found to exist, the court may determine the rights of the various damage claimants, on the merits, including the amount of damages, even though the right to limit liability is denied. The court will not consider individual claims until it has determined the question of liability affecting all claimants alike.

The filing of claims and the proof of claims are two distinct procedural steps which are often separated in point of time by the trial of the issues of petitioner's right to limitation of liability.[87] If claimants contest the right of petitioner to limitation, it is customary to hold in abeyance the question of proof of damages by the claimant,[88] and only after it has been determined that petitioner is entitled to limit his liability does the proceeding go to the commissioner for full proof of claimant's damages.[89] A decree declaring a ship to be in fault and fixing the damages which the respective parties sustain is res judicata and, until reversed, must stand as the basis for determining their pro rata share of the fund substituted by stipulation for the ship and freight.[90] Where the question of liability is involved in the limitation proceeding and liability is found to exist, the court may, subject to the rules discussed supra subdivision a of this section, determine the rights of the various damage claimants, on the merits,[91] including the amount of the damages,[92] even though the right

Basis of determination
In proceeding for limitation of liability, the determination of damages to be awarded for injury to a vessel to limit liability is denied,[93] and in this respect the court applies, it seems, substantially the same rules as would be applied in an independent proceeding by the damage claimants.[94] The court will not enter on the consideration of individual claims until it has determined the question of liability affecting all claimants alike.[95]

Claims against the estate of the owner of a vessel may, in a proper case, be heard and determined.[96]

c. Decree

The decree in a proceeding for limitation of liability should conform to the rights of the petitioner and the claimants and the circumstances presented; it may be in personam against the petitioner or in rem against the res or substituted fund.

The court may, in a proper case, enter judgment in personam against petitioner for limitation of liability[97] and also a judgment in rem against the res or substituted fund,[98] and, even where there is no res in the possession of the court, the court may impose personal liability on petitioner.[99] Where, however, there is no res in court and the circumstances are such as to prevent a judgment in personam, no relief may be afforded the damage claimants.[1] Where both the right to limit liability and the existence of liability are at issue, if liability is found to exist and loss or damage is shown, which was not occasioned or incurred with the knowledge or privity of the owner, limitation of liability should be decreed.[2] A charterer entitled to limitation will be held liable only in the amount of his bond,[3] and the claimant may have judgment for a deficiency against a subcharterer not entitled to limitation.[4] Where the issue as to liability is involved, on denying the right to limit liability, if the damage claimants do not seek dismissal, the court may, in the limitation proceeding, grant complete relief to the damage claimants[5] by judgment against the res or fund in court[6] and distribution thereof among the damage claimants entitled thereto,[7] and by a personal judgment against petitioner for any deficiency.[8] Parties to a proceeding for limitation of liability who voluntarily appear or, after they are brought in, whether or not rightfully, join issue with petitioner and between themselves, and litigate questions of liability, are bound by the decree.[9]

Power of court as to decree; vacation or modification. After the entry of its decree in a limitation proceeding, the power of the admiralty court with respect to it is at an end;[10] but it has also been held that the court's power to modify[11] or is not a matter of formulas, but there must be a reasonable judgment having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts—The Russell No 5, D C N Y, 32 F Supp. 582.

d. Apportionment and Distribution of Compensation Fund

The compensation fund is to be distributed among the persons holding established claims, the claimants sharing pro rata if the fund is insufficient to satisfy the demands against it. The question of preference out of the fund is to be determined in the limitation proceeding, and not by the owner of the vessel.

The admiralty court has jurisdiction of the fund representing the value of the vessel,[13] and of the enforcement of claims on that fund,[14] as auxiliary and incidental to its jurisdiction of the main subject. The compensation fund is to be distributed among the persons holding established claims, to which admiralty does not deny existence,[15] whether or not the claims are liens in admiralty.[16] If the fund is insufficient to satisfy the demands against it, claimants must share pro rata,[17] certain costs and expenses of the proceeding to limit the liability of the shipowner being first paid out of the fund, as discussed infra § 257 b. Where limitation of liability has been denied as to some claims and allowed as to others, and petitioner is solvent, the claims as to which limitation is denied are not paid out of the limitation fund,[18] and only those claims as to which limitation is allowed are payable out of such fund.[19] Ordinarily, at least, petitioner has no concern with respect to the apportionment of the fund.[20]

Preference or priority. The question of preference out of the fund is one to be determined in the limitation proceeding.[21] The view has been taken that, under the provision of the limited liability act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 184, that, if the whole value of the vessel and her freight for the voyage is not sufficient to make compensation to each of them, the persons injured shall receive compensation in proportion to their respective losses, the rule that all claimants are to share pro rata applies in general, irrespective of their claims to priority as lien claimants or otherwise,[22] notwithstanding the admiralty rule which provides that the fund in court, or secured, or the proceeds of the vessel and freight, shall be divided pro rata amongst the several claimants in proportion to the amount of their respective claims, duly proved and confirmed, saving, however, to all parties any priority to which they may be legally entitled.[23] On the other hand, it has been held that a damage claimant for loss of cargo on a vessel, which was partly at fault for the collision which caused the loss, is entitled to a preference, in the distribution of a fund arising from the limitation of the liability of the other vessel, over the claim of the owners of the first mentioned vessel;[24] and under such admiralty rule an amount recoverable by a damage claimant who is liable to other damage claimants for loss or injury arising out of the collision involved in the limitation proceedings is applicable to the claims of such other damage claimants.[25] Holders of maritime liens of the same class are entitled to pro rata distribution, without regard to the dates of issuing process or obtaining decrees, unless their rights have been forfeited.[26] The owner of a vessel in respect of which limitation is sought cannot determine for himself the priority of claims on the fund representing his liability under the limited liability act,[27] and, where he has set up his claim to limitation by answer in a suit against him, the fact that he has voluntarily paid out parts of the fund in discharge of liens supposed to be superior to the claim on which the suit against him

Death claims; government's claim. Claims for the deaths of members of the crew of a government vessel, sunk by another vessel, have been held prior to the claim of the government for damage to its vessel;[29] and the fact that the government is not liable for the deaths is immaterial in this connection.[30]

§ 257. —— Review, Fees, and Costs

a. Review
b. Fees and costs

a. Review

General principles governing review in admiralty have been applied to proceedings for limitation of liability, as to such matters as appealability of orders or decrees, parties to appeal, and harmless error.

An order in a limitation proceeding which is not a final decree or an interlocutory decree determining the rights and liabilities of the parties is not appealable,[31] but an interlocutory order enjoining the litigation of claims in any other tribunal has been held appealable.[32] Where the substantial and only question, in the limitation proceeding, was as to the power of the district court to render a personal judgment or decree against the company having the custody, control, and management of the vessel at the time of the accident, an appeal was held not to lie to the circuit court of appeals.[33]

On appeal from a decree in admiralty in a proceeding for limitation of liability, the trial is de novo,[34] and the court of appeals has power not only to correct error in the decree, but to make such disposition of the case as justice may require at the time of the appeal.[35] The court sits in equity on such an appeal,[36] and may give to one of several claimants whose aggregate claims are less than the fund the right to maintain separate actions.[37] The reviewing court will be bound by a finding of the lower court which is not clearly erroneous,[38] and, where a special commissioner or master has heard and seen the witnesses and examined all of the exhibits, and the court has affirmed his findings, his findings of fact are conclusive on the court if there is any substantial evidence to support them.[39] A reviewing court will accept a valuation of petitioner's vessel, approved in the court below on the basis of the opinions of experts, where there is some evidence justifying such valuation.[40] Where the evidence in the limitation proceedings was all taken out of court, the reviewing court is not required to give effect to the presumption usually arising from the fact that the trial court sees and hears the witnesses,[41] and is at liberty to draw its own conclusions from the evidence in the record.[42]

On court of appeals determining that dismissal of petition to limit liability was proper because bond posted by charterer was inadequate, remand to district court in order to give charterer an opportunity to file a larger bond would have been a better course than affirmance of dismissal of petition, in view of the six-month limitation on proceeding under statute, since defect was not jurisdictional —Black Diamond S S. Appeal to supreme court. Proceedings to limit liability have been held admiralty cases within the meaning of a statute making the judgments or decrees of the circuit court of appeals, now the court of appeals, in admiralty cases final, and not appealable to the supreme court;[43] but the decisions in such cases may be brought up for review by the supreme court by certiorari.[44]

Parties to appeal; notice. Where two or more parties, having distinct and several claims against the owner of a vessel, are brought into one proceeding for the limitation of his liability, the decree awarding different sums to the different claimants is several as to them, and any of such claimants may appeal from such decree without making the others parties to the appeal[45] or notifying them thereof.[46]

Harmless error. The decision of the lower court will not be reversed where the error committed was harmless.[47]

b. Fees and Costs

The award of costs in limitation proceedings is generally within the discretion of the court. The expenses of administration are to be paid out of the fund before distribution; the petitioner must bear the expense of availing himself of the benefit of the limited liability act; and the costs of contesting any issue, as between the petitioner and claimants, fall on the losing party.

The general rule in admiralty suits that the award of costs is within the discretion of the court, as discussed in Admiralty § 196 b, applies in a proceeding to limit liability.[48] The fees of the commissioner appointed to make an appraisal and to report on claims are part of the costs.[49]

Docket fees. While there is authority to the effect that, where there are several damage claimants petitioner is entitled to but one docket fee,[50] other authorities hold that he is entitled to a docket fee from each,[51] on the ground that each of the claimants, if successful, might have charged a docket fee against petitioner.[52] While it has been held that each person claiming and recovering damages is entitled to a separate proctor's fee,[53] there is authority for the view that a proctor who represents several claimants who recover is entitled to but one docket fee.[54]

Fund or person chargeable. The admiralty rule providing for the distribution of the fund, after payment of costs and expenses, appears to have been given rather a broad construction in some of the early cases, in respect of the costs and expenses payable out of the fund before distribution,[55] but the rule now generally applied is that ordinarily payments to be made out of the fund are the expenses of administration.[56] Petitioner must bear the expenses which he has incurred for the purpose of availing himself of the benefit of the limited liability act,[57] and has been required, as a matter of usual procedure, to bear the burden of the costs of the limitation proceeding,[58] and to pay the appraisers' fees;[59] but the expenses incurred by him in defending the suits brought in other courts have been held taxable against claimants.[60] In general, if any issue is contested in the proceeding between petitioner and claimants, or any claimant, the costs should fall on the losing party,[61] including the issue as to the right to limitation,[62] or as to the liability of petitioner,[63] and all such costs should be taxed without referring to the fund or its existence.[64] In a proceeding for limitation of liability, as between the commissioner and petitioner, petitioner is primarily liable for the fees of the commissioner.[65]

Security for costs. Contesting damage claimants in a proceeding for limitation of liability must give security for costs,[66] especially where the vessel in respect of which limitation is sought is a total loss,[67] unless relieved from doing so on a proper showing of inability because of poverty[68] or on some other recognized ground.[69]

Costs in other suits. Payment of the costs of claimant in an action in a state court against the person seeking limitation of liability is not a condition to the maintenance by the latter of proceedings for limitation;[70] but in case of undue delay in commencing a limitation proceeding, ordinarily relief should not be granted except on condition of compensating damage claimant for any costs and expenses he may have incurred by reason of the delay,[71] and an owner seeking limitation of liability after the recovery of judgment on the claim against which limitation is sought has been required to pay the costs of the trial and the appeal.[72] The injunction granted in a proceeding to limit the liability of a shipowner, restraining the prosecution of suits pending against the shipowner, should not prohibit the collection of the taxable costs in such suits.[73] The limited liability act does not release the owners from the payment of costs in the district court beyond the amount of the stipulation filed therefor in a suit against the vessel to enforce liability, if they appear and make defense;[74] nor did such statute relieve the owners from the payment of the costs taxable in the circuit court or of interest in the nature of damages occasioned by the appeal, where, prior to the abolition of the circuit court, the owners appealed to such court.[75]

XIII. WRECK

§ 258. Definitions, Nature, and Distinctions

Strictly, the word "wreck" applies only to property cast on shore, more broadly, it is that which has been rendered useless or irrecoverable by peril of the sea, and, loosely, is used for shipwrecked goods in general.

The meaning of the word "wreck" has been said to have been passed on in many cases arising under maritime law,[76] and in such cases the word has a technical significance.[77] "Wreck" has been defined to be such goods as after a shipwreck are cast on land by the sea and left there,[78] and as the ruins of a ship which has been stranded or dashed on a shelf, rock, or lee shore by tempestuous weather,[79] and, in general, in a strict sense, the term "wreck" or "wrecks" applies only to property cast on the shore[80] So, goods are not wrecks in a strict sense as long as they remain afloat in the sea in the jurisdiction of admiralty,[81] and, thus, none of the goods coming under the definition of flotsam, jetsam, or lagan, or ligan, as separately defined in this work, can be called or claimed "wreck" as long as they remain on the sea;[82] but, if they are cast on the land by the sea, they then become wreck.[83] More broadly, however, "wreck" has been defined as that which has been rendered useless or irrecoverable by peril of the sea,[84] and in a loose sense the term is used for shipwrecked goods in general,[85] and in this sense it includes flotsam, jetsam, and ligan, which are subjects of admiralty jurisdiction.[86] The word "wreck" has been said to be descriptive of a vessel which is a total loss, and may be abandoned by the owner[87]

"Lost" distinguished. The term "lost" has been distinguished from "wrecked."[88]

Title may be acquired to a wrecked vessel or its cargo by taking possession thereof after abandonment by the owner, but not in the absence of such abandonment.

By the common law of England a wreck belonged to the crown until reclaimed by its rightful owner,[89] which had to be within a year and a day; otherwise it belonged to the crown absolutely, the year and a day beginning to run from the day the goods were actually taken and seized by the finder[90] In the United States, however, this rule of the common law has not been accepted, at least to its full extent[91] While the view has been expressed that no length of time will divest the owner of property found derelict on the sea,[92] and that the owner of a vessel, sunk in navigable waters, does not lose his property rights therein, unless he abandons such rights,[93] it has been laid down in general terms that a wrecked vessel, after abandonment, has no owner,[94] and it has been held or recognized that property in a sunken vessel and her cargo may be lost by abandonment[95] so that a person subsequently taking possession may acquire title.[96] The owner of a wrecked vessel on a desert island has been held to have no title to a small vessel built from the remnants, as the only means of escape from the island,[97] and, where the owner of a vessel sunk by collision recovers the full value of the vessel in a suit in admiralty on the ground that the vessel is a total loss, and is actually paid the amount decreed, title to the submerged vessel passes to the party who pays the amount of the decree.[98]

A purchaser of vessels or goods wrecked or abandoned, at a sale made according to municipal regulations of the country where found, divests previous titles.[99]

§ 260. Protection and Sale and Application of Proceeds

Under some state statutes officers are named to care for and sell wrecks and apply the proceeds. Admiralty has jurisdiction to order the sale of a wrecked ship, on the master's application.

Under statutes in the several states, officers, variously designated, are named, whose duty it is to care for wrecks,[1] and, after specified steps, to sell them and apply the proceeds as provided in the statutes.[2] Admiralty has jurisdiction to order the sale of a wrecked ship, on the master's application,[3] and the general rule as to the conclusiveness of a decree of a foreign admiralty court applies in the case of a decree ordering the sale of wrecks and property left derelict.[4] Under the Canadian statute, the owner of a vessel which has become a wreck and is a menace to navigation is required to remove the wreck at his own expense,[5] and, if he fails to do so, the government is authorized to bring about the removal and to charge the expenses to the owner.[6]

The duty to mark a wreck in navigable waters is discussed in Navigable Waters § 45 c. The amount of the award for salvage rendered to derelict property, and the disposition of derelict property in salvage proceedings, are considered in Salvage § 128.

§ 261. Injuries to Wreck

The owner of a wreck may recover for willful or negligent injury thereto.

The owner of a wreck may recover for unnecessary injury, willful or negligent, thereto,[7] as by another vessel.[8]

§ 262. Offenses

A statute making it punishable to steal property from, or destroy property belonging to, a wrecked vessel does not apply to property abandoned by the owners.

Under some statutes it is punishable to steal, plunder, or destroy property from, or belonging to, a wrecked or stranded vessel.[9] Under such a statute it has been regarded as a felony for the master of a ship to embezzle money belonging to the ship, on deserting it when stranded;[10] but it has been held that such a statute does not apply to property which has been abandoned by the owners.[11]

SHIPSIDE. The ordinary signification of the word in a railroad company's bill of lading for shipment to a certain point "shipside" is a direction to deliver the shipment at some wharf accessible to its track.[1]

SHIPWRECK. Admiralty jurisdiction over shipwrecked property is treated in Admiralty § 22. Recovery of wages by shipwrecked seamen is discussed in Seamen § 76. Wrecks are treated generally in Shipping §§ 258–262. See also the titles Collision and Salvage.

SHIRE. The word is derived from the Saxon, and signifies a circuit or portion of the realm into which the whole land is divided for the better government thereof and the more easy administration of justice.[2] It has the same meaning as "county" see Counties § 1 b.

SHIRR or SHIR. To pucker or draw up (a fabric or a part of a fabric) by means of parallel gathering-threads.[3]

Shirred. A technical term of doubtful origin,[4] meaning wrinkled or contracted.[5]

SHOCHET. A Jewish religious official, certified in writing by one or more rabbis as being qualified to slaughter animals in accordance with the ritual requirements and precepts of the Jewish Orthodox faith.[6] Shochtim, the plural of "shochet,"[7] are the only persons qualified to slaughter animals in accordance with Jewish dietary laws.[8]

SHOCK.

The noun[9] "shock" has a number of meanings.[10]

In agriculture, the term "shock" designates a group of sheaves of grain placed standing in the field with the stalk-ends down, and so arranged as to shed the rain as completely as possible, in order to permit the grain to dry and ripen before housing;[11] the small collection and arrangement of a few sheaves together, in the field, in such a manner as to protect them against the weather for a few days, until the farmer has time to gather them into his barn or place them in the large conical pile called a stack.[12]

In a physical sense,[13] the word "shock" is defined as meaning a blow, impact, collision, concussion, or violent shake or jar;[14] a violent collision of bodies, or the concussion caused by it;[15] the collision or concussion of two physical bodies striking together;[16] a sudden striking or dashing together or against something.[17]

The word "shock" is frequently used with reference to person, and as so used is broadly defined as meaning a sudden agitation of the physical or mental sensibilities;[18] a sudden agitation of body or mind.[19] Thus a shock may affect the body or mind,[20] and it may be referred to as "corporeal" when it affects the vital powers, and "psychical" when it affects the emotions of the mind.[21]

startling emotion, as the shock of a painful discovery, or a shock of grief or joy.[24] However, the term may mean simply a surprised or disgusted state of the emotions, which momentarily disappears.[25]

The term "shock" is frequently employed in a pathological or medical sense,[26] and in its pathological sense it means an abnormal condition, either of mind or of body, or of both mind and body.[27] In its medical or pathological sense the term is defined as meaning a sudden depression of the vital forces of the entire body, or part of it, marking some profound impression produced on the nervous system, as by severe injury, a surgical operation, profound emotion, or the like;[28] a sudden depression of the vital functions, due to the nervous exhaustion following an injury or a sudden violent emotion, resulting either in immediate death or in prolonged prostration;[29] a state of profound depression of the vital processes of the body characterized by pallor, rapid but weak pulse, rapid and shallow respiration, restlessness, anxiety or mental dullness, and sometimes nausea or vomiting;[30] a state of profound depression of the vital processes resulting from wounds, hemorrhage, crushing injuries, blows, etc.;[31] a condition of profound prostration of voluntary and involuntary functions, of acute onset, caused by trauma, surgical operation, or excessive sudden emotional disturbance (mental shock);[32] a prostration of the bodily functions, as from sudden injury or mental disturbance.[33]

The noun "shock" has been distinguished from "concussion" see 15 C J.S. p 806 note 6, and "fright" see 37 C J.S. p 1382 note 10.

Shock as an element of damages see the index to the title Damages.

As a verb, "shock" is defined as meaning to offend the sensibilities of someone; to strike with surprise, terror, horror or disgust;[34] to cause to tremble, to recoil; to stun.[35]

SHODDY. Fiber remanufactured of shredded rags of stocking, yarns, flannels, and other soft woolen fabrics;[36] the refuse thrown off in the shearing or finishing of woolen cloths.[37] It has been distinguished from "mungo" see 61 C.J.S. p 945 note 66.

SHOE. An outer covering or dress for the human foot, usually distinguished from a boot by not reaching above the ankle, generally made of leather, but sometimes of cloth, india-rubber, wood, or other material.[38] A shoe ordinarily is composed of uppers, soles, and heels, sewed or otherwise joined together in such manner as to constitute an article of apparel for the feet.[39] The term has been distinguished from "boot" see 11 C.J.S. p 523 note 38, "moccasin" see 58 C.J.S. p 838 note 31, and "shoe-upper."[40]

The word "shoe" has other meanings, and as applied to a clincher tire it means the outer cover which attaches to the rim and serves to protect and retain the inflated inner tube on the rim.[41]

SHOOK. A box knocked down and not nailed up; articles of wood, cut by machinery from sawed planks, and fashioned into shapes and sizes suitable for making boxes, by the simple process of nailing them together; lumber cut into suitable shapes and sizes for boxes and put into bundles.[43] The term may be used to designate a set of boards for a sugar box; a set of staves sufficient in number for one hogshead, cask, barrel, and the like, trimmed and ready to be put together.[44]

SHOOT. In one sense, the word "shoot" is defined as meaning to let fly, or cause to be driven, with force, as an arrow, bullet, or other missile, from a bow, sling, gun, or the like;[45] to discharge.[46]

In a slightly different sense, the word "shoot" means to strike with anything shot,[47] and this is said to be an established definition of the term.[48] In the same sense "shoot" is defined as meaning to hit with a missile;[49] to hit, wound, or kill, with a missile discharged from a weapon;[50] to kill or wound with a firearm;[51] and the term generally implies the use of a firearm,[52] and it is frequently employed in the sense of "kill."[53]

As applied to motion, the word "shoot," in common understanding, means to move with great velocity,[54] and when the object so moving has weight it necessarily implies force.[55]

"Shoot," in connection with the game of craps, is defined in Gaming § 1 d; and the words "shoot" and "shooting" in mining terminology are defined in Mines and Minerals § 3 h. The shooting of animals as constituting cruelty is discussed in Animals §§ 70, 72; and shooting at or in trains, cars, and engines as an offense see Railroads § 1009. For other specific references see the indexes to the titles Assault and Battery, Indictments and Informations, and Homicide; and consult the Descriptive-Word Index.

Phrases employing the term are set out in the note.[56]

SHOOTER. In general, one who, or that which, shoots.[57]

SHOP.

As a noun. The word "shop" appears to be derived from the old high German "schopf" or "scopf" which meant a building without a front wall.[58] It is a term of various significance,[59] and has many definitions,[60] and it may have different meanings when used with different texts.[61] In its popular, as well as in its legal, meaning, the term is not confined to a workshop,[62] but neither is it confined to a store,[63] and it may include both a store and a workshop.[64]

Expressing the workshop concept, the word "shop" is defined as meaning a building inside of which a mechanic carries on his work;[65] a building in which mechanics work;[66] a building in which an artisan carries on his business, or laborers, workmen, or mechanics, by the use of tools or machinery, manufacture, alter or repair articles of trade;[67] a small establishment, or a room, department, or building devoted to a particular line in a factory or large establishment, in which mechanics or artisans work, as, a shoe shop, a car shop, a machine shop;[68] a place in which a mechanic pursues his trade;[69] a place where any mechanic art is carried on[70] or where some mechanic art is practiced;[71] a place of manufacture or repair.[72]

The word "shop" may denote a place where goods are sold,[73] a place, building, or room in which things are sold;[74] and, expressing this concept, the term is defined as meaning a place kept and used for the sale of goods;[75] a place where goods are sold by retail;[76] a building or an apartment in which goods, wares, drugs, etc., are sold at retail.[77] A shop, however, is a place not only for selling but also for storing goods.[78]

Since the word "shop" may include both a store and a workshop as stated supra p 1265 note 64, the term is sometimes defined as meaning a building in which mechanics labor or work, and where they keep,[79] or sometimes keep,[80] their manufactures for sale; any building or room used for carrying on any trade or business adapted to be carried on in a building or room and employing a stock in trade.[81]

The word "shop" is sometimes defined as meaning a store;[82] a store kept for the sale of goods;[83] and the terms "shop" and "store" have been held to be synonymous.[84] However, the terms have also been distinguished,[85] and in distinguishing them it has been said that they cannot be deemed to be equivalents or of the same legal import.[86]

"Shop" has been held to be synonymous with, or equivalent to, "storehouse,"[87] and "warehouse"

As a verb. The term "shop" is defined as meaning to visit shops for the purpose of purchasing or inspecting goods.[89]

Phrases employing the term are set out in the note.[90]

SHOPBOOK RULE. See the title index to Evidence.

SHOPKEEPER. One who keeps a shop for the sale of goods; a trader who sells goods in a shop or by retail, in distinction from a merchant, or one who sells by wholesale.[91] The term has been held synonymous with "tradesman,"[92] and it has been distinguished from "dealer" see 25 C.J.S. p 1043 note 10, and "merchant" see 57 C.J.S. p 1064 note 71.

SHORE. While it has been said that "shore" is a word of doubtful meaning,[93] it has also been said that the word has a well-understood,[94] and a well-defined legal[95] meaning, although it is subject to construction by the terms of the instrument in which employed and the surrounding circumstances.[96]

The word "shore" in its strict sense,[97] and as used in England,[98] belongs to,[99] or is reserved for,[1] the ocean, and, correctly speaking, applies only to the land adjacent to the sea or other tidal waters,[2] and is strictly applicable only to the space on a tidal river,[3] sea,[4] or lake.[5] That is, it must be such land as is affected by the tide,[6] since, precisely defined, the term is not appropriate to land on the side of water that is not affected by the ebb and flow of the tide.[7]

The word does not have such a limited meaning in America,[8] and in both the United States and Canada[9] it is applied to nontidal water,[10] and is loosely[11] used with reference to nontidal[12] fresh[13]

water, rivers,[14] lakes,[15] or ponds.[16] However, it has been said that technically,[17] and generally,[18] the term has application only to large bodies of water, and is not applied to land contiguous to a small stream.[19]

Various statements have been made by the courts as to how far in the direction of the land, and how far in the direction of the water, the shore may be considered to extend It is generally recognized that the shore is a band of land with two margins, an inner or landward margin, and an outer or seaward margin;[20] and that the inner or landward margin corresponds with high-water mark, and the outer or seaward margin corresponds with low-water mark,[21] and the definitions of the term which are set out in following paragraphs are generally to the effect that it encompasses the land between high- and low-water mark. In a popular or extended sense, however, the word "shore" is not limited to the land between high and low water,[22] and it may refer to the land near the border of the sea, or of a great lake, to an indefinite extent.[23]

Under the common law, the shore extends in a landward direction only as far as the ordinary tides flow,[24] that is, the daily tides,[25] and is not determined by the high spring tides, or tides caused by an unusual combination of circumstances.[26] However, even in common-law jurisdictions the word "shore" in common parlance is often used with a more extensive meaning, taking in all that extensive belt of waste ground or strand, shingles, and rock liable to the action of every kind of tide,[27] but in legal intendment no more of this tract is shore than that portion which lies between high- and low-water mark at ordinary tides.[28]

The civil-law rule as to the landward extent of the shore of the sea or other tidal water is not the same as the common-law rule. The rule of the civil law is that the shore extends to the line of the highest tide,[29] that is, as far as the highest waves reach,[30] in winter.

Similarly expressed
The shore of the sea landwards is, in the absence of particular usage, prima facie limited by the line of the medium high tide between the spring tides and the neap tides; or, in other words, the shore is that area which for four days in every week, or for the most part of the year, is reached and covered by the tides. As this line will vary as the sea recedes from or encroaches on the land, so the boundaries of the shore will vary with the recession or encroachments of the sea. Land above this line, though overflowed by high spring and extraordinary tides, is not shore.—Wood v. Maitland, 8 N Y.S.2d 146, 151, 169 Misc. 484.

Under the civil law of Spain, the shore of the sea took in all that part which was covered by water, whether in the winter or in the summer.—Sullivan v Richardson, 14 So. 692, 708, 33 Fla 1

Basic law of Spain and Mexico
"Since the common law was adopted in Texas after the grants were issued, the boundary between the sea and the upland must be determined in accordance with the principles announced in Las Siete Partidas, the basic law of Spain and Mexico, which defines the shore of the sea as all the ground 'which is covered with the water of the latter at high tide during the whole year, whether in winter or in summer.'"
—Humble Oil & Refining Co v. Sun Oil Co, C A.Tex, 190 F.2d 191, 194, 195.

Civil-law rule explained
"In Borax Consolidated v. City of Los Angeles, 296 U.S 10, at page 22, 56 S.Ct. 23, 29, 80 L.Ed 9, the court said. 'By the civil law, the shore extends as far as the highest waves reach in winter. [citing] Inst lib. 2, tit. 1, § 3; Dig. lib 50, tit. 16, § 112'; but we are governed on this point by state rather than federal decisions. Moreover, the original of the Institutes is: Est autem littus maris, quatenus hibernus, fluctus maximus excurrit, which may be literally translated: 'However, the shore of the sea in the fourth quarter or winter is where the highest wave extends.' According to the Digest, the Latin is: Littus publicum est eatenus qua maxime fluctus

Both in civil-law countries and in common-law countries the seaward boundary of the shore is the low-tide line,[31] and, while it has been indicated that this boundary is the ordinary low-water mark,[32] and it has been said that by the common law the shore is confined to the flux and reflux of the sea at ordinary tides,[33] it has been stated that actually the shore extends in a seaward direction to the line of the lowest tide.[34]

When the word "shore" is used with reference to land unaffected by the tide, in determining how far from the water's edge the shore begins, it has been said that in the absence of any banks or other highlands to mark the boundary, the only definite line the shore has is the water's edge,[35] and it is the edge of the water at low-water mark.[36]

The word "shore" is defined as meaning the space, land, or ground which lies between ordinary high- and low-water mark.[37] The land lying between the high-water and the low-water mark at ordinary tides;[38] the space or land between high- and low-water mark;[39] the space between high and low tide;[40] the land over which the daily tides ebb and flow;[41] that part of the land covered by water in its greatest ordinary flux;[42] the land which is exaestuat, which literally translated is 'The public shore extends up to where the highest wave boils up or foams' The reference is not to waves or sea water in a storm but in an estuary, or exit to the sea, as when the water boils up where the tide meets the current of a river The word exaestuat is from exaestuo, are, avi, atum (from which the English word aestuary is derived), it illustrates the danger from different versions in translations Compare the law of Scotland, whereby the mouth of a river, ostium fluminis, comprehends the whole space between the lowest ebb and the highest flood mark (meaning the lowest ebb and highest flood of the tide). The ordinance of Louis XIV provides. 'All the space which is covered and discovered by the new and full moon, and as far as the tide extends at the high flood of March [emphasis supplied], shall be reputed to be the seashore' There would be no certainty as to the upland boundary of the shore if we took into consideration points to which sea water is driven by the wind. There are vestiges of hurricane floods for fifty miles or more inland from Beaumont to Brownsville; and the shore of Texas would be cut into fantastic shapes by these overflows if wind-driven waters extended its upland boundary in low places, while the high ground on each side showed no evidence of such overflows. The tide is another matter, there is nothing erratic about it The tide is the rising and falling of the water of the sea that is produced by the attraction of the sun and moon, uninfluenced by special winds, seasons, or other circumstances . . . The tide delimits the shore, and is no respecter of the conflict of laws" —Humble Oil & Refining Co v. Sun Oil Co., supra.

In England the shore belongs to the king, but the reason for limiting the king's title to medium high tide does not apply to limit that of the subject to medium low tide. The reason for extending the title of the riparian owner to low water is to preserve his access to the water, and he must therefore have a right to go until he reaches the water even at its lowest ebb.—Bay City Land Co v. periodically covered and uncovered by the tide;[43] that space of land which is alternately covered and left dry by the rising and falling of the tide;[44] the space or ground over which the tide ebbs and flows and is bounded by the high and low water marks.[45] The word "shore" is further defined as meaning the land on the margin[46] or the side[47] of the sea or a lake or river; the edge or margin of land;[48] the water's edge[49] at low-water mark;[50] the coast or land adjacent to the ocean, or sea, or a large lake or river;[51] the "litus maris;"[52] the beach.[53]

When applied to a river, the term "shore" means the river's banks above the low-water mark,[54] that band,[55] bank,[56] or margin[57] of a river which lies between the high- and low-water marks, the bank of the river,[58] or that portion of the bank which touches the margin of the stream at low water;[59] and it has been said that, in the commonly accepted use of the word, the shore of a river is the land adjacent to the water line.[60] While the word "shore" is sometimes defined as meaning the actual, as well as the nominal, bed of a river,[61] it is also defined as meaning that part of the bed lying between the top of the bank and that part of the bed where the water actually flows, and which, as the water rises or falls is land or water.[62]

The word "shore" has been held to be synonymous with "bank" see Navigable Waters § 88, "beach" see 10 C.J.S. p 217 note 98, "flats" see Boundaries § 4, "strand,"[63] and "tidelands."[64]

"Shore" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "flat" see 36 C.J.S. p 1023 note 25, "harbor" see 39 C.J.S. p 774 note 56, and "water."[65]

The word "shore" is treated in various connections throughout this work, particular reference being made to Boundaries § 31, Counties § 15, and Navigable Waters § 88. See also the definition Seashore 79 C.J.S. p 929 notes 2–14. For other specific references consult the Descriptive-Word Index.

SHORT. The term "short" is defined as meaning not long from end to end; of brief length; not tall;[68] and in this sense it is distinguished from "long" see 54 C.J.S. p 795 note 32.

"Short" is also defined as meaning not coming up to a measure, standard, requirement, or the like, or to something regarded as such; as an account which is short of the truth; lacking in what is due.[69] A statement that a person is "short" in his accounts as constituting an imputation of crime to support an action for defamation see Libel and Slander § 68.

The word "short" is a term of the stock and produce exchanges, and implies that a person has less of the commodity than may be necessary to meet demands and obligations as stated in Gaming § 1 h.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.[70]

SHORTAGE. A deficiency or deficit;[71] the amount by which anything is deficient or short,[72] any deficiency in a quantity warranted.[73]

"Shortage" is a word of general signification,[74] and it may include a deficiency which is without personal fault, or one which is the result of fault or crime.[75] It does not necessarily imply a criminal act,[76] but may have reference merely to a discrepancy resulting from carelessness or unintentional error,[77] or to a situation where a person, in a position of trust, has on hand less assets than he should have.[78]

A statement that a shortage exists in a person's accounts as constituting an imputation of crime sufficient to support an action for defamation see Libel and Slander § 68.

SHORTEN. To make short or shorter in measure or time; to reduce or diminish in amount, quantity, or extent.[79] It has been said that the word implies the opposite of abolition.[80]

SHORTLY. In point of time, it is a relative term,[81] and means in a short or brief time or manner; presently; quickly; soon;[82] within a reasonable time.[83] It has been said that "shortly" used in relation to "simultaneously," is measured by hours or days rather than by weeks.[84]

SHORTSIGHTED. Not able to discern far into the future, not appreciative or mindful of results or future needs; lacking foresight.[85] It has been distinguished from "prudent" see 73 C.J.S. p 273 note 33.

SHOULDER. The dictionaries give various definitions of the word "shoulder,"[88] such as a prominent or projecting part below the top,[89] and, in man, the laterally projecting part of the body, each side of the base of the neck, formed by the bones and joints by which the arm is connected with the trunk and by the muscles covering them.[90] In connection with tires, the somewhat angular portions at the margins of the crown are called "shoulders."[91]

The term "shoulder" has been distinguished from "top."[92]

SHOVE. To push along, as on a surface; urge along by force, whether directly or by indirect means.[93] It has been held synonymous with "push" see 73 C.J.S. p 1264 note 49, and it has been compared with, or distinguished from, "carry" see 13 C.J.S. p 1764 note 17, "convey" see 18 C.J.S. p 87 note 42, "draw" see 28 C.J.S. p 488 note 18, "move" see 61 C.J.S. p 943 note 32, and "transport."[94]

SHOVELER. The term is defined generally as meaning a laborer who works with a shovel.[95] It is also used in coal mining terminology to describe a man whose duty it is to remove the coal, after it has been blown down, by loading it into cars for transportation to the mouth of the mine, as stated in Mines and Minerals § 3 h.

SHOW. As a noun, the word "show" is defined in the C.J.S. title Theaters and Shows § 1, also 62 C.J. p 841 note 16 as meaning a sight or spectacle; an exhibition; a pageant; a play.

The verb "show" has various meanings depending on the context in which it is used.[96] It is defined as meaning to present to view;[97] to exhibit;[98] to display,[99] to disclose;[1] to make known;[2] to reveal;[3] to relate;[4] to tell.[5]

"Show" is also defined as meaning to explain;[6] to teach; inform; instruct;[7] to make apparent or

Founded on teachings of Jesus Christ
The maxim "is not founded in any human statute, but in that sentiment expressed by Him who taught good will toward men, and said, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself.' Freely trans-own as not to injure another's property."[56]

The maxim limits the use of property,[57] and voices the well-settled rule of the common law that a person who negligently uses a dangerous instrument or article, or causes or authorizes its use by another person, in such a manner or under such circumstances that he has reason to know that it is likely to produce injury is responsible for the natural and probable consequences of his act to any person injured who is not himself in default.[58] It is a corollary of this maxim that everyone shall investigate, inspect, and test the instrumentalities maintained by him, guided in so doing by the knowledge that common experience offers with respect to the possibility of peril,[59] but this does not require that every peril, including such as are latent or hidden, need be discovered,[60] and the maxim should be so restricted in its application as not to restrain an owner of property from a prudent and reasonable exercise of his right of dominion.[61] The maxim applies to corporations as well as to individuals.[62]

This maxim has been called honorable[63] and just,[64] humane and venerable,[65] and at the present time as important for the protection of the rights of society and of the individual as it has been during the centuries it has been recognized and followed by courts of justice,[66] and it has been said that any departure from it would be subversive of fundamental private rights.[67] However, it has also been the subject of criticism,[68] and courts have recognized lated, it enjoins that every person in the use of his own property should avoid injury to his neighbor as much as possible No one ought to have the legal right to make a malicious use of his property for no benefit to himself, but merely to injure his fellow man. To hold otherwise makes the law an engine of oppression with which to destroy the peace and comfort of a neighbor, as well as to damage his property for no useful purpose, but solely to gratify a wicked and debasing passion"—Barger v Barringer, supra.

68. Criticism expressed

(1) "Perhaps no legal phrase is cited more frequently than Sic utere, etc It is not uncommon for judges to decide important cases without practically giving any reason save the quotation of this maxim, which is evidently regarded by the court as affording, by its very terms, a satisfactory ratio decidendi. Yet in the vast majority of cases this use of the phrase is utterly fallacious"—Hale v Farmers Electric Membership Corporation, 99 P.2d 454, 456, 44 N.M 131.

(2) "The maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, is iterated and reiterated in our books, and yet there is scarcely an aphorism known to the law the true application of which is more vague and undefined Interpreted literally it would enjoin a man against any use of his own property which in its consequences might injuriously affect the interest of others; but no such legal principle ever existed While, therefore, Sic utere tuo, etc., may be a very good moral precept, it is utterly useless as a legal maxim. It determines no right, it defines no obligation."
N.M.—Hale v Farmers Electrical Membership Corporation, supra
N.Y—Auburn & Cato Plank Road Co. v. Douglass, 9 N Y. 444, 445.

(3) "The maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, as commonly that it does not present a hard-and-fast rule to be generally employed.[69] The maxim has been applied in a number of cases.[70]

Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas is the basis of the principles governing the use of property as discussed in Property § 13 b(2) (b), and is at the foundation of the law of nuisances as stated in Nuisances § 8.

The general rule that a person must so use his own property as not to injure others is stated in Negligence § 4 b(2) (a), and is referred to in its various specific applications throughout the title, as in § 74 where it is applied to real property.

Other maxims. "Sic" as the first word of other maxims as to which there have been no recent applications see 58 C.J. p 706 notes 1, 2.

SICK. Affected with disease;[71] affected with diseases of any kind;[72] ill; indisposed; not in heath;[73] weak; ailing; diseased; disordered;[74] affected with, or attended by, nausea, inclined or inclining to vomit.[75]

In a somewhat different sense, "sick" is defined as meaning having a strong dislike, disgust with, of, as to be sick of flattery, to be sick of a country life.[76]

The term is sometimes used as a prefix to certain nouns such as bay, berth, bungalow, bunk, chamber, allowance, book, club, cookery, etc., as meaning appropriate or given up to, occupied by one or more persons in a state of illness; of or pertaining to, connected with, persons suffering from illness.[77]

The word "sick" is used interchangeably with "sickness," and is practically of the same import.[78]

translated (So use your own as not to injure another's), is doubtless an orthodox moral precept; and in the law, too, it finds frequent application to the use of surface and running water, and indeed generally to easements and servitudes But, strictly, even then, it can mean only, 'So use your own that you do no legal damage to another's' Legal damage, actionable injury, results only from an unlawful act This maxim also assumes that the injury results from an unlawful act, and paraphrased means no more than 'Thou shalt not interfere with the legal rights of another by the commission of an unlawful act,' or 'Injury from an unlawful act is actionable' This affords no aid in this case in determining whether the act complained of is actionable, that is, unlawful It amounts to no more than the truism An unlawful act is unlawful This is a mere begging of the question, it assumes the very point in controversy, and cannot be taken as a ratio decidendi"

N M —Hale v Farmers Electric Membership Corporation, supra.

(4) "The plaintiffs lean heavily on the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas This maxim, so often cited as the governing principle of decisions, affords little, if any, aid in the determination of the rights of parties in litigation. If it be taken to mean any injury to another by the use of one's own, it is not true, and, if it means legal injury, it is simply a restatement of what has already been determined, 'The maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, is mere verbiage A party may damage the property of another where the law permits, and he may not where the law prohibits so that the maxim can never be applied till the law is ascertained, and, when it is, the maxim is superfluous' Erle, J, in Bonomi v. Backhouse, El Bl. & El 622, p. 643; 2 Austin, Jur (3rd) 795, 829. The maxim is undoubtedly a sound moral precept expressing an ideal never fully attained in the social state."

Incapacitation

One is not ordinarily considered sick who performs his usual occupation, although some organ of the body may be affected; he is regarded as sick when that diseased condition has advanced far enough to incapacitate him.—Leftwich v. Phrases employing the term are set out in the note.[79]

SICKNESS. The term "sickness" is said to have a well-defined meaning,[80] and signifies a disease;[81] a malady;[82] a particular kind of disorder;[83] any morbid condition of the body which for the time being hinders and prevents the organs from normally discharging their several functions;[84] any affection of the body which deprives it temporarily of the power to fulfill its usual functions.[85]

It is also defined as meaning the state of being sick or diseased;[86] the state of being sick or suffering from disease;[87] a diseased condition of the system,[88] illness;[89] ill health.[90]

"Sickness" is further defined as meaning a disordered, distracted, or enfeebled state of anything.[91]

The word "sickness" has been defined by the application of definitions of the term "sick" as meaning affected with disease;[92] affected with disease of any sort;[93] not in good health;[94] ill;[95] indisposed.[96]

Under the scientific, technical definitions of "sickness" the disability must arise from a pathological condition and affect the organs of the human system,[97] but construed according to common understanding "sickness" is considered merely as a condition interfering with the usual avocations.[98] The term has been held not to mean a trifling illness, or an occasional physical disturbance resulting from accidental causes not permanent in their effects, or a temporary illness which readily yields to professional treatment and leaves no permanent injury or disorder calculated or having a tendency to shorten life.[99] Sickness is either such as affects the body generally or only some part of it,[1] and, under some circumstances, is deemed to be an act of God.[2]

SICUT. A Latin word meaning "as."[5] It is the introductory word of a number of phrases and maxims.[6]

SIDE. The term "side" has many meanings,[7] and whether one meaning or another is intended depends entirely on the context.[8]

The word is often used to express the idea of a line, edge, or surface,[9] and it may be used of all the bounding surfaces of an object,[10] and in this sense is defined as meaning the margin, edge, verge, or border of a surface;[11] any one of the bounding lines of a surface;[12] the bounding line of a geometrical figure,[13] one of the two terminal surfaces, margins, or lines of an object.[14]

However, the term "side" may not always refer to the border or edge,[15] nor does it always include the marginal parts of a surface,[16] and it may be used as exclusive of parts that may be called top, bottom, edge, or end, etc.[17] It may refer to any part or position viewed as opposite to, or contrasted with, another,[18] and it is sometimes used to express the half or part lying on one side or the other of a central line, either actual or imaginary, drawn through a body;[19] one-half of the body (human or otherwise), considered as opposite to the other half,[20] especially one of the halves of the body lying on either side of the mesial plane, that is, of a plane passing from front to back through the spine.[21]

"Side" is also defined as the position of a person or party regarded as opposed to another person or party.[22]

With reference to courts, "side" means a province or field of jurisdiction.[23]

The word "side" has been distinguished from "edge" see 28 C.J.S. p 829 note 2, "end" see 30

Phrases employing the term are set out in the note.[24]

SIDE-KICKER. A coined expression which is said never to have been accorded the dignity of a place in the dictionaries and to be without any standing in lexicology. As a matter of common knowledge, it is not an uncommon expression in the vernacular of the street and is often used in colloquial conversation; and it may with equal propriety express a social relationship between the parties to whom it is applied or convey the idea that they are business partners or have business interests in common.[25]

SIDEMEN. Members of an orchestra other than the leader.[26]

SIDEROSIS. That type of pneumoconiosis which is due to the inhalation of metallic dust.[27]

SIDEWALK. While it has been said that the term "sidewalk" has a definite[28] and well-understood[29] meaning, it has also been stated that the word is a comprehensive one,[30] and that it has no strict legal interpretation, and its meaning and import must be governed by facts showing the limits and extent of the same in the street where it is located.[31]

A sidewalk is a part of the street,[32] and it is that part of a street or highway which is intended for use by pedestrians.[33] It is usually constructed as a part of the street at or along the side of the part thereof especially designed and constructed for the passage of vehicles and animals,[34] and there is often, if not generally, a gutter, which also constitutes a portion of the street, between such parts.[35] When

(1) "Side-bar rule;" in English practice, there are some rules which the courts authorize their officers to grant as a matter of course without formal application being made to them in open court, and these are technically termed "side-bar rules," because formerly they were moved for by the attorneys at the side bar in court, such, for instance, was the rule to plead, which was an order or command of the court requiring a defendant to plead within a specified number of days. Such also were the rules to reply, rejoin, and many others, the granting of which depended on settled rules of practice rather than on the discretion of the courts, all of which have been rendered unnecessary by statutory changes—Black L D

the sidewalk is spoken of as being on a specific side of a designated street, it is understood to be a part so reserved of that street at or along the specific side of the roadway.[36]

While a sidewalk is constructed somewhat differently from other portions of the street which are used by animals and vehicles, generally,[37] the word "sidewalk" does not mean a walk or way constructed of any particular kind of material or in any special manner,[38] and a sidewalk does not necessarily consist of a walk made of boards or a place paved or otherwise improved for the use of foot passengers.[39]

The word "sidewalk" is variously defined as meaning that part of the street assigned to the use of pedestrians;[40] that part of the street upon either side thereof that has been arranged for foot passengers, and not intended for use by vehicles and horsemen;[41] that portion of the street usually devoted to pedestrian travel;[42] that portion of a highway which has been set apart for pedestrians as distinguished from that which is used by vehicles;[43] that part of a street of a municipality which has been set apart and is used for pedestrians, as distinguished from that portion set apart and used for animals and vehicles;[44] that part of a street which the municipal[45] or town[46] authorities have prepared[47] or set apart[48] for the use of pedestrians; the space between the property line and the street curbing, set apart for that purpose,[49] a place set apart at the side of the street for the use of that portion of the public that travels on foot.[50]

"Sidewalk" is also defined as meaning the public way, generally somewhat raised, especially intended for pedestrians and adapted for their use;[51] a raised way for foot passengers at the side of a street or road;[52] a footway for passengers at the side of a street or road;[53] a footwalk by the side of a street or road;[54] a walk along a highway;[55] a way for foot passengers;[56] a foot pavement.[57]

It has been said that the word "sidewalk," taken in its ordinary and familiar acceptation, with regard to its general and popular use, does not include driveways,[58] and neither does it include a path constructed for the use and convenience of bicycle riders, and which has never been designated, set apart, or used as a sidewalk.[59] However, the term "sidewalk" may include a dirt approach to a bridge, with a stone wall on each side, stringers laid on the dirt, and a plank walk laid on the stringers for foot passengers,[60] and it may include a space on the side of a public bridge reserved for use of pedestrians crossing a river between two streets.[61] Where a sidewalk has become unsuitable, another part of the street, made constant use of by the public for foot passage, may become a sidewalk, within the usual meaning of the term.[62]

"Sidewalk" has been distinguished from "crosswalk" see 25 C.J.S. p 12 note 60, although a street crossing may be considered in a sense as a part of the sidewalk;[63] "sidewalk" has also been distinguished from "pavement" see 70 C.J.S. p 185 note 36.

Sidewalks are treated in various connections throughout this work, and for specific references consult the indexes to the titles Highways, Landlord and Tenant, Motor Vehicles, and Municipal Corporations. See also the Descriptive-Word Index.

SIGN. The word "sign" has a number of meanings.[72]

As a noun, it is defined as meaning a lettered board, or other conspicuous notice,[73] placed on or before a building, room, shop, or office to advertise the business there transacted, or the name of the person or firm there conducting it;[74] an inscribed board, plate, space, or the like serving for information, guidance, advertisement, etc., as on or before a building or a place of business, or along a street or road;[75] an inscription or representation to indicate a place of business;[76] a token; emblem;[77] a publicly displayed token or notice;[78] an arbitrary mark; symbol;[79] a signum.[80] In a different sense, it is defined as meaning a pantomimic gesture.[81]

The noun "sign" has been held synonymous with "lettering" see 52 C.J.S. p 1054 note 2, and it has been distinguished from "signal."[82]

The verb "to sign" is defined and distinguished from "to subscribe" in Signatures § 1, and reference is there made to phrases employing the word "sign" as a verb.

SIGNAL. The noun "signal" is defined as meaning a sign made to give notice of something, as of a command or danger;[83] a sign, event, or watchword which has been agreed on as the occasion of concerted action; that which incites to action; an initial cause or impulse.[84] It has been distinguished from "sign" see supra note 82.

The verb "signal" is defined as meaning to communicate by means of an understood sign.[85]

Many of the rules of navigation which are designed to prevent marine collisions provide for the giving of signals, either visible or audible or both. These rules specify the signals which shall be given in particular situations, as when a vessel is enshrouded by fog, or when a vessel is engaged in fishing, or in towing, or is at anchor, or is in distress, and are treated in their various aspects in the title Collision; and for specific references see the index to that title.

Reasonable care in the operation of a motor vehicle may require that a motorist give warning signals of his approach as stated in Motor Vehicles § 288 a, and a considerable part of automobile law deals with the signals which are required and the liability which attaches when such signals are not given or are given improperly; and for specific references see the title index.

In railroad terminology a "signal" is the doing of some act whereby notice or warning is given, such as ringing a bell, blowing a whistle, waving a lantern, or shooting a torpedo as stated in Railroads § 1 l, and various railroad signals are there defined. For other references see the title index.

Signals are treated in various other titles through-

a. Definitions and Distinctions

The word "sign," used as a verb, may be defined to mean to affix a signature; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting. The word "signature" may be defined as a name, mark, or sign affixed to, or made on, an instrument or document in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation.

The verb "to sign" is defined as meaning "to affix a signature to,[1] to ratify by hand or seal,[2] to subscribe in one's own handwriting;"[3] to show or declare assent, or attention, by some sign or mark;[4] to write one's name on paper, or to show or declare assent or attestation by some sign or mark,[5] and, as applied to a written instrument, ordinarily it indicates the signing with one's own hand.[6] A signature has also been defined as the act of putting down a person's name at the end of an instrument to attest its validity,[7] any mark or sign made on an instrument or document in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation;[8] and also as whatever mark, symbol, or device one may choose to employ as representative of himself.[9] Stated in greater detail, in legal contemplation "to sign" means to attach a name or cause it to be attached by any of the known methods of impress-

ing the name on paper with the intention of signing it.[10]

A signature consists both of the act of writing the person's name and of the intention of thereby finally authenticating the instrument.[11]

While by long usage and custom "signature" has come generally to mean the name of a person written by himself, his autograph,[12] that signification is derivative, and is not inherent in the word itself.[13]

Other terms compared or distinguished. The words "subscribe" and "sign," are to be distinguished,[14] as are also the words "subscribed" and "signed."[15] The word "sign," used as a verb, and forms thereof, generally have a more comprehensive meaning than the word "subscribe" and forms thereof.[16] "To sign" applies to every species of written authentication, while "to subscribe" indicates the making of a particular kind of signature.[17] At common law an instrument might be "signed" by placing the signature anywhere on it, but "subscribing" a writing means, generally, a signature at the end or bottom thereof.[18] However, under some circumstances the words "signed" and "subscribed" have been regarded as interchangeable,[19] and the word "subscribe" or "subscribed" has been held to mean "sign" or "signed,"[20] and the word "signed" has been construed to mean "subscribed."[21]

A distinction in meaning has been recognized between "execute" and "sign,"[22] between "executed" and "signed,"[23] and between "execution" and "signing"[24] or "signature,"[25] but under some circumstances "executed" has been regarded as synonymous with "signed"[26] or "signature,"[27] and "execution" has been regarded as synonymous with

"signed,"[28] "signing,"[29] or "signature."[30]

An indorsement may be equivalent to a signature.[31]

b. Necessity

In the absence of a statutory requirement of signature, a party to an instrument or document may be bound by it even though he has not affixed his signature.

Instruments not required to be in writing or signed by the parties may be binding if accepted by the parties although not signed.[32] In the absence of a statutory requirement of signature, it is not essential to the validity of a sealed instrument that the obligor sign it; sealing it is sufficient.[33] When a signature is essential to the validity of an instrument, an acknowledgment is not a substitute therefor, or proof that it has been signed.[34]

c. Purpose and Intent

A signature is affixed to a writing for the purpose of authenticating it and for the purpose and with the intent that the signer shall be bound by the writing.

The signature to a writing is placed there for the purpose of authenticating it[35] or to give notice of its source,[36] and for the purpose and with the intent that the individual signing the writing shall be bound thereby.[37]

§ 2. Requisites and Validity

a. In general
b. Location
c. Adoption of signature

a. In General

Generally, if there is a requirement that an instrument shall be signed or subscribed, it is sufficient if the signature is affixed in any manner which is commonly used. In the absence of statute providing otherwise, a person may use as his signature any character, symbol, figures, designation, or name other than his own, provided such form is used as a substitute for the name of such person.

Where an instrument is required to be signed, it is usually sufficient if the signature is affixed in any manner which is commonly used,[38] and a like rule applies when subscription is required.[39] Variance between signature and name in body of instrument is not necessarily fatal to the validity of the instrument.[40]

As a general rule and in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a person may use any character,[41] symbol,[42] figures,[43] or designation[44] he thinks proper to adopt as a signature, and be bound thereby, provided it is used as a substitute for his name.[45] A person may also use a fictitious name,[46] a firm name,[47] or the name of another;[48] and a signature used by a person may be sufficient to give validity to an instrument even though it is illegible.[49] It is not necessary that the entire name should be written,[50] and the insertion in, or the omission from, a signature of a middle name is immaterial.[51] A form of signature prescribed by statute is not exclusive of any other method legally sufficient to accomplish the same result.[52] The fact that the word "signed" is inserted before a signature does not render the signature insufficient.[53]

By whom made A signature may be made by the purported signer himself, as shown infra § 5, or through someone duly authorized by him,[54] but but the name of a person attached to a paper does not make it his act and deed unless he put it there himself or caused or permitted it to be put there by another.[55] Under a statute requiring an instrument to be signed in person,[56] or using similar words,[57] the signature must be made by the person's own hand or by another at his request and in his presence, and previous authority or subsequent ratification is not sufficient.[58]

b. Location

The usual place of a signature is at the end of the matter or instrument which is to be authenticated or attested, and it is sometimes essential that the signature should be so placed; but generally, in the absence of statutory requirement as to location, a signature placed in any part of the instrument is sufficient.

The usual place for a signature is at the end of the matter or instrument which is to be authenticated or attested;[59] it is proper to place the signature at the end,[60] and it is sometimes necessary to do so,[61] as, for example, according to some authorities, where a statute provides that an instrument or writing shall be subscribed,[62] although there is authority for the view that, under some statutes providing that an instrument shall be subscribed, it is not essential that the signature should be affixed at the end.[63]

Generally, in the absence of a statutory requirement as to the location of a signature, the place of a signature on a writing is not controlling,[64] it is not necessary that the signature appear at the end of the instrument,[65] and the signature may be sufficient if the name of the person whose signature is required is placed by him in any part of the instrument,[66] according to the decisions on the question, for the purpose of authenticating it,[67] as at the head[68] or in the body[69] of the instrument, or if it is written across the face of a document,[70] or even if it is placed on another statement or writing accompanying the instrument.[71]

A signature placed between two parts of an instrument may apply to the whole instrument if it is shown to have been so intended.[72] Where, however, written or printed matter appears below the signature,[73] on the back of the instrument,[74] or on separate sheets of paper,[75] a signature authenticates only the matter intended by the parties to be included as part of the instrument, and it is essential that the intention should be manifested either by express reference or by internal evidence in the writings involved from which an inference of intention follows.[76]

Where a person intends to sign as a witness to an instrument, but signs it in the place for the principal to sign, the fact that he signed as a witness may be shown.[77] Likewise, where a signer intends to sign as a principal but signs in the place of a witness, that fact may be shown.[78]

c. Adoption of Signature

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a person may adopt a signature made for him by another or a signature made by him on a previous occasion.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a person may adopt a signature written for him by another,[79] by subsequent approval and ratification,[80] and a signature written in the absence of a person may be adopted even when forged.[81] A signature purposely made by a person on a previous occasion may be adopted for a new writing then made, with the same effect as though made anew.[82]

§ 3. —— Use of Initials and Abbreviations

An instrument may be properly signed where only the initial letter or letters of the Christian or given name or names are used with the surname, where only the full surname is used, where only the Christian or given name is used, or even where initials only are used, if a fuller signature is not required or contemplated under the particular circumstances.

If a fuller signature is not required or contemplated under the particular circumstances, an instrument is properly signed, even though only the initial letter or letters of the Christian or given name or names, with the full surname, are used,[83] or only the full surname,[84] or only the Christian or given name of the person signing,[85] is used.

Signature may be by contraction of the real name.[86] A signature may be made by the use of initials only[87] unless it is contemplated that the usual and complete name should be used.[88] Initials alone, if used as a signature, are as efficacious as a signature as the whole name at length.[89] A signature may be sufficient where the title of the signer is abbreviated.[90]

§ 4. —— Mark as Signature

a. In general
b Sufficiency

a. In General

Generally, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a signature may be made by the use of a mark where the signer is unable to write his name, or even, according to some authorities, where he is capable of writing.

"Mark," as a signature, has been defined as a character, usually a cross, made as a substitute for a signature by one who cannot write.[91] Generally, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, signature may be made by the use of a mark,[92] where the signer is unable to write his name,[93] as, for example, where, notwithstanding he knows how to write, he is physically unable to write.[94] According to some authorities, a mark may be used as a signature even though the person making it is capable of writing.[95] When an instrument is signed in this manner the person is bound as effectually as though he had written his full name to it.[96]

The term "signature" is defined by some statutes as inclusive of a mark by a person who cannot write,[97] or by an illiterate or infirm person,[98] and a signature made by mark in the manner provided for is sufficient.[99] Under some statutes, if a written signature is required and the signer is unable to write, the signature should be by his mark.[1] is written, and a signature by mark may be sufficient, notwithstanding the name accompanying the mark is written incorrectly, the wrong name is written, no name accompanying the mark is affixed, or words indicating that the mark is intended as such are omitted.

In the absence of statute otherwise providing, it is immaterial by whom the name of the person accompanying the mark is written,[4] and the full name of a party accompanying a mark made by him may be written by the obligee on the instrument.[5] The signature is not necessarily rendered insufficient by the fact that the full name written by another and accompanying the mark is written incorrectly,[6] the fact that a wrong name is written there,[7] or by the fact that words indicating that it is intended as a mark are omitted,[8] at least where the full name accompanying the mark is written in the presence and at the request of the party.[9] In the absence of a statute requiring a name to accompany the mark, the validity of the mark as a signature is not affected by the fact that no name accompanies it.[10]

Location. When a mark is used as a signature, it may be placed wherever the ordinary signature could be placed,[11] and, where the name must accompany the mark, the fact that the mark and the name are not in immediate proximity is immaterial.[12]

(2) Attestation

A signature by mark may be valid at common law, although it is not attested by a witness. Under some statutes providing for attestation it has been held that a signature by mark which is not witnessed in the manner provided is not valid, but under other statutes the view has been taken that the method provided by statute is not exclusive and that the effect of compliance therewith is only to establish prima facie the genuineness of the signature.

A signature by mark, although not attested by a witness, may be valid at common law.[13] Some statutes require attestation of a signature by mark but an instrument which is not included within the terms or scope of the statute may be signed by mark without attestation.[14] A signature which meets the statutory requirements as to attestation is sufficient.[15]

Under some statutes providing for the method of witnessing a signature by mark, the view has been taken that, in the absence of compliance with the statute, the instrument is not signed,[16] and that it is essential to the validity of a signature by mark that it be witnessed in the manner provided,[17] except where the instrument is acknowledged before an officer competent to take acknowledgments,[18] or where certain documents are executed before a judicial officer.[19] These rules have been applied or recognized with respect to a statute providing that a signature or subscription includes a mark when the person cannot write and his name is written near the mark by a person who writes his own name as a witness,[20] and it has been held that, under such statute, in the absence of any recognized exception, it is essential that the person who writes the name of the signer by mark should also write his own name as witness.[21]

Under other statutes the view has been taken that the method provided by the statute for proving the signature by mark of a person who cannot write is not exclusive,[22] and that the effect of compliance with the statute is only to establish prima facie the genuineness of the signature without other proof of signing;[23] in the absence of compliance with the statute a mark is not a prima facie signature,[24] unless properly acknowledged before an officer authorized to take acknowledgments,[25] and, hence, the mere presentation of a signature not so witnessed or acknowledged is not evidence of its validity.[26]

Under a statute providing for a signing by mark to be witnessed, the obligee in an instrument may be a competent witness where the obligor signs by mark,[27] but there is some authority to the contrary.[28] It has been held that an agent of the obligee having no present pecuniary interest in the instrument may become the attesting witness required by statute[29] Where a statute requires that an attesting witness shall be able to write and shall write his own name, it has been held that a mark cannot be used as a signature by the witness.[30]

§ 5. —— By Hand of Party

A signature may be made by the hand of the purported signer either by his unaided efforts or with the aid of another.

A signature may be made by the hand of the person whose signature it purports to be,[31] either by his own unaided efforts,[32] or with the aid of another,[33] as, for example, where such other, with the signer's consent, guides the latter's pen or pencil[34] Where the maker of an instrument in signing his name is assisted by another person guiding or steadying his hand, the signature thus made is the act of the maker and not the act of the person assisting him.[35]

Under some statutes, if a written signature is required and the signer is able to write, the signature must be in the signer's own handwriting[36]

§ 6. —— By Hand of Another

Generally, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a signature may be made for a person by the hand of another who acts in the presence of such person at his direction or request or with his acquiescence.

Generally, a signature may be made for a person by the hand of another,[37] acting in the presence of such person,[38] and at his direction,[39] or request,[40] or with his acquiescence,[41] unless a statute provides otherwise.[42] A signature so made becomes the signature of the person for whom it is made,[43] and it has the same validity as though written by him.[44] Such mode of signing is sufficient for a sealed instrument, even though the party affixing the signature does not have authority to do so under seal.[45] Where a signature is made in this manner the person writing the name is regarded as a mere instrumentality, by which the person whose signature is written exercises his own discretion and acts for himself,[46] and not through an agent.[47] So a mark made for a person at his direction may be regarded as his signature.[48]

The writing of a name or the making of a mark by one other than the person whose signature the name or mark purports to be may constitute a sufficient signature of such person, where he touches the pen or pencil used in the process while the purported signature is being made,[49] but the touching of the pen or pencil is not essential to the validity of the signature.[50] It is not necessary under all circumstances that the signature of a person made by the hand of another at the request of such person should be made in the presence of such person.[51] The fact that a mark does not accompany a name written by the hand of another does not affect the validity of the signature[52]

By obligee for obligor. There is authority to the effect that neither of the contracting parties can act for the other in making signatures,[53] and that an obligee is incompetent to subscribe for an illiterate obligor,[54] but it has been held that the agent of the obligee having no present pecuniary interests in the instrument,[55] or a merely nominal obligee,[56] may act for the obligor in signing an instrument. The view has been taken that the rule that an obligee is incompetent to sign for the obligor applies only when the instrument is required to be in writing and signed by the parties,[57] and that one contracting party may sign for another where the signature is not required by statute.[58]

Signing through agent A signature may be made through an authorized agent.[59]

§ 7. —— Mode of Affixing

Generally, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, a signature may be affixed by writing by hand, by printing, by stamping, or by various other means.

In the absence of a statute prescribing the method of affixing a signature, it may be affixed in many lithographed on an instrument by a party may be sufficient for the purpose of signing it,[68] and it has been held or recognized that it is immaterial with what kind of an instrument a signature is made.[69]

§ 8. —— Evidence

There may be a presumption that a written signature on an instrument was written by the purported signer himself, and, where there is a presumption that an instrument was duly signed, one who alleges want of due signature has the burden to prove his claim. The genuineness of a signature may be proved by evidence.

There may be a presumption that a written signature on an instrument was written by the purported signer himself,[72] and a person's act in signing his name to an instrument raises the presumption that he intends thereby to authenticate the instrument.[73]

Where there is a presumption that an instrument was duly signed, one who alleges want of due signature has the burden to prove his claim.[74]

When a signature is shown not to be in the handwriting of the person whose signature it purports to be, the law will not presume other affirmative facts which would have made the signature binding, but the existence of such facts is a matter of proof.[75] Where a purported signature is in the hand of another than the purported signer, one who alleges the effectiveness of the signature has the burden to prove that it was written under such circumstances as to show the intent of the purported signer to authenticate the instrument.[76] A signature by mark must be proved as any other signature,[77] and, ordinarily, one who alleges a signature by mark has the burden of proof.[78]

Admissibility The appearance of the writing of a signature may be considered in determining its genuineness,[79] and the fact that a signature appears to be written with pen and ink is some evidence as to its genuineness.[80] Evidence that a purported signer could not write is admissible to show that the purported signature is a forgery.[81] Where the signature of a subscriber to an instrument was written by a third person, parol admissions of the party whose name is signed are admissible as tending to show that it was done by his authority.[82]

Signature by mark may be proved to be genuine by testimony of witnesses to the making of the mark,[83] and an instrument executed by a mark may be proved by the testimony of one who witnessed it, whether or not he was named as a subscribing witness.[84] Testimony to the effect that the purported signer habitually used a mark instead of an ordinary signature,[85] or tending to establish some peculiarity in the mark itself,[86] or evidence that the mark was acknowledged by the maker as his mark,[87] is admissible to prove the genuineness of a signature by mark. When a signature by mark not attested in the manner provided for by statute is regarded only as not being a prima facie signature, other evidence of the execution of the mark than that provided for by statute may be offered for the purpose of proving its genuineness.[88]

Weight and sufficiency. The mere fact that a person's name is attached to an instrument is not sufficient proof of its genuineness.[89] Circumstantial evidence that a party could write and was always accustomed to writing his name is not sufficient to overcome direct and positive evidence that in a particular instance the signing was by mark.[90] Under some circumstances, an oath by a purported signer verifying an instrument containing a mark and the certificate of the duly authorized officer before whom the oath was taken may be sufficient proof of the genuineness of the mark.[91]

Where the ultimate question is the genuineness of a signature by mark and a subscribing witness is out of the state, proof of the handwriting of such witness has been regarded as sufficient,[92] and a like rule has been applied when the subscribing witnesses to a signature by a mark are dead.[93] The view has been expressed, however, that proof of the handwriting of such witness is not sufficient if he is within the state.[94]

Denial of genuineness of a signature by a subscribing witness is not conclusive evidence that the signature is not genuine or sufficient,[95] and a question of fact remains as to whether or not the signature is genuine or sufficient.[96]

§ 9. —— Official Signatures

While in some instances the use only of the initials of a public officer as a signature has been regarded as sufficient, it has been held or recognized that, under some circumstances at least, the surname is an essential part of an official signature and that the use of mere initials is not sufficient in legal proceedings.

While in some instances the use only of the initials of a public officer as a signature has been regarded as sufficient,[97] it has been held or recognized that, under some circumstances at least, the surname is an essential part of an official signature,[98] preceded by the initials or full given name,[99] and that mere initials are not a signature in legal proceedings.[1] A signing by the surname in full and the Christian name by its initials is generally sufficient in official signatures.[2] The fact that the name of an officer is near the word "countersigned" on a paper signed by several officers does not render the signature insufficient.[3] The official character or title of the signer may be abbreviated.[4]

By whom made. It has been held that signatures made by public officers in their official capacities to certain documents which the law requires to be signed by them must be made by the officers themselves and cannot be made by another in the presence and at their direction,[5] but the sufficiency of a signature made for an officer by another in the

Mode of affixing. While the view has been taken that, under some circumstances at least, the typewritten name of an officer on an official document is not sufficient to constitute a signature,[7] and a like view has been taken as to the use of a facsimile signature produced by a rubber stamp,[8] it has been held or recognized that, under some circumstances, an officer may sign by means of a facsimile signature,[9] of an autographed signature stamp,[10] of a rubber stamp,[11] or of a typewriter.[12]

SIGNBOARD. A board for or bearing a notice or sign.[1]

SIGNIFY. To make known[2] by signs or words;[3] express; communicate; announce; declare.[4] It has been held to be synonymous with, or equivalent to, "indicate" see 42 C.J.S. p 883 note 8.

SIGNING. See Signatures § 1.

SIGNUM. A Latin term, employed in the Roman and civil law to signify a sign; a mark, a seal; the seal of an instrument.[5] The term is also employed to denote a species of proof.[6]

In Saxon law, the word "signum" denoted the sign of a cross prefixed as a sign of assent and approbation to a charter or deed.[7]

"Signum" has been held to be synonymous with "sigillum" see ante p 1281 note 71.

SILD. A Norwegian word said to be synonymous with "herring."[8]

SILENCE. The state of a person who does not speak, or of one who refrains from speaking.[9]

"Silence" has been distinguished from "concealment" see 15 C.J.S. p 795 note 26.1, and "suppression of fact" see 35 C.J.S. p 386 note 37.

The general rule as set out in Fraud § 15 is that mere silence is not representation, but an exception to this rule exists where the circumstances impose on a person a duty to speak and he deliberately remains silent, as stated in Fraud § 16. For other references to the treatment of silence in connection with the law of fraud see the index to the title Fraud; and see Fraudulent Conveyances § 351.

Where a person, on being accused of crime, with full liberty to speak, remains silent, his silence is relevant as tending to show his guilt as stated in Criminal Law § 734 Admissions by silence as admissible in civil actions see Evidnce §§ 294–297.

Silence is treated in various connections in the law of agency and in the law of estoppel, and for specific references see the indexes to the titles Agency and Estoppel. For other specific references consult the Descriptive-Word Index.

"Cone of silence" as an aeronautical term is discussed in Aerial Navigation § 2.

SILENT LEGES INTER ARMA.[10]

SILHOUETTE. Originally a portrait in black or some other uniform tint, sometimes varied as to the hair or other parts by lighter lines or a lightening of shade, showing the profile as cast by a candle on a sheet of paper, hence any opaque portrait, design, or image in profile; a representation of the outline of an object filled in with a black color; a profile portrait in black, such as a shadow appears

SILICA. In chemistry, silicon dioxide or silicic anhydride, SiO_2, occurring naturally in crystalline form as quartz, tridymite, etc. and in amorphous form as opal. Sand is impure silica.[12] It is also referred to as a silicic acid in a state of purity.[13] Silica is said to occur in two forms, "free" and "combined,"[14] and, as stated post p 1299 note 56, it is only free silica which can cause silicosis

SILICOSIS. An insidious, subtle,[18] progressive,[19] specific,[20] chronic,[21] disease[22] of the lungs.[23] Silicosis is sometimes called a pathological condition,[24] a chronic condition of the lungs,[25] a latent, chronic process,[26] and it is defined generally as a fibrotic condition of the lungs due to prolonged inhalation and accumulation of minute particles of dust containing free silica;[27] a deposit of particles of silica in the tissues; specifically a chronic fibroid condition of the lungs or bronchial lymphatic glands, produced by inhalation of minute particles of silica.[28]

Silicosis is a form of pneumoconiosis,[29] and medically it is known as "pneumonoconiosis," or more simply as "pneumoconiosis silicosis."[30] It is also known as "stonecutter's disease,"[31] and it has been recognized for many years under the appellation of "stonecutter's consumption."[32]

It is well known[33] that silicosis is an occupational disease,[34] and is considered to be a typical illustration of an occupational disease,[35] since it is not a disease to which workmen would be equally exposed outside the place of employment,[36] and usually it is contracted under circumstances concerning which the employer should be fully and accurately informed.[37] However, it is only comparatively recently that it has been recognized as an occupational disease to which persons other than stonecutters may be subject by reason of their inhalation of silicate or quartz dust.[38]

Silicosis is prevalent among employees in mines, potteries, stone and slate factories,[39] and in file-cutting and metal grinding enterprises,[40] where the air is permeated with minute particles of stone, quartz, slate, or metal dust which is inhaled to the detriment of the tissues, glands, and lungs.[41]

Silicosis is not an injury by accident;[42] it is not a germ disease,[43] and is neither transmissible nor infectious.[44]

Disease not an accident

"His employer's subjection of . . . [the employee] to work in an unventilated, dust-filled workroom was all along intentional and usual. It was the cause of his disease. The latter was a fibroid condition of his lungs, insidiously started and slowly continued through the chronic to the fatal stage, by his inhalation, through long hours of many working days, year after year, of minute airborne particles of silica dust. Such a cause defies reasonable inclusion in any reasonable definition of accident. Accidents do not and cannot take years in the happening."—Golden v. Lerch Bros., 300 N.W. 207, 210, 211 Miss 30

44. Ky.—Coburn v. North American Refractories Co., 174 S.W.2d 757, 763, 295 Ky. 566.

The contributing cause of silicosis is well known to the medical profession,[45] and it is known to be caused by, or to result from, breathing into the lungs particles of silica[46] or quartz[47] dust,[48] or sand particles,[49] and over a more or less long period of time as stated infra note 64. These particles lodge on the lining membrane and by chemicalization pass through the lining, causing the formation of nodules,[50] and resulting in tissue damage,[51] and a chemical[52] destruction of the lung tissue,[53] the lung injury being caused by the chemical action of the silica particle, rather than the mechanical irritation.[54]

Silica occurs in two forms, "free" and "combined" as stated ante p 1297 note 14, but silicosis is due to the inhalation of free silica or dust containing free silica,[55] and it is only free silica which can cause silicosis.[56]

It is stated supra note 50 that the particles which are breathed into the lungs cause the formation of nodules, and the rapidity with which these nodules increase in size and density depends on factors such as the individual's physical characteristics, his economic situation, and the duration and intensity of exposure.[57] Thus the incurring and development of silicosis depends somewhat on the constitution of the person, and somewhat on the conditions under which he works,[58] and the rate at which silicosis develops under the same conditions varies with different persons,[59] and it has been said that some persons appear to be immune to the disease.[60] However, a large proportion of those who are engaged in pursuits where the air is permeated with minute particles of stone, quartz, slate, or metal dust are susceptible to silicosis.[61]

Chemical action described
(1) A chemical action leads nature in self-defense to build a wall of fibre around the poison. An increasing number of these fibrous lumps, called nodules, gradually block off the blood supply and finally the air-passageways.—Ruffertshafer v. Robert Gage Coal Co., 289 N.W. 151, 153, 291 Mich. 254.

(2) Silica dust inflicts injury to the lungs, not because of the physical properties of the individual particles, as the hard, sharp particles of quartz and carborundum; but its danger lies purely in its poisonous chemical action. Because of this, it causes tiny areas of necrosis in the walls of the lymph spaces of the alveoli in which it is deposited, at which necrotic points, by ways of healing, there develop fibrosis and a proliferation of the surrounding epithelial cells, the latter explaining the nodule formation.

It is known that the relationship of the dust concentration and the duration of exposure are important etiological factors of silicosis,[62] and, while the course of the disease may be rapid or gradual,[63] it is generally recognized that the inhalation of the harmful dust or particles must be over a more or less long period of time,[64] since the disease usually[65] requires a long period for its development,[66] but it is not certain how many particles must lodge, or over what period of time, to cause the disease,[67] since these two factors are reciprocal variants.[68] The size of the particles is also a factor to be considered since in order to cause silicosis the silica must be present in the air in particles small enough to enter the finer air spaces of the lungs, and only particles which are less than ten microns in diameter are harmful.[69]

Silicosis is evidenced by pathological changes in the lung structure attributable to the effects of the inhalation of harmful dusts over a long period of time,[70] and it is characterized anatomically by generalized fibrotic changes and the development of military nodulation in both lungs,[71] and clinically,[72] by shortness of breath,[73] and also characterized

65. Period of development

(1) Medical authorities state that it usually takes seven or more years of exposure to silica dust for the worker to contract the disease. A few cases have been known to develop in as short a period as one and one-half years, but these were under extreme and unusual conditions. The disease may have developed to such an extent that it is susceptible of diagnosis by an experienced doctor with the aid of X-ray and yet the objective symptoms may be so slight that the victim may be entirely unconscious of having contracted the disease.—Pocahontas Corp. v. Richardson, 42 S.E.2d 260, 262, 186 Va. 367.

(2) The course of the disease sometimes extends over a period of several years before the victim is finally disabled for the performance of manual labor.

Utah.—Uta-Carbon Coal Co. v. Industrial Commission, 140 P.2d 649, 653, 104 Utah 567.

(3) The course of the disease of silicosis sometimes extends over a period of twenty years or more.—Argonaut Mining Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra.

(4) Experience shows that the average time of exposure and development into a disability to be ten years.—Ruffertshafer v. Robert Gage Coal Co., 289 N.W. 151, 153, 291 Mich. 254.

(5) It develops slowly and inexorably, symptoms are latent and may not appear until long after X-ray signs of silicosis are demonstrable, oftentimes years after the employment ceases. Because of the insidious and progressive nature of the disease the worker is usually unaware of it and his physician frequently overlooks it.—Ruffertshafer v. Robert Gage Coal Co., supra.

(6) It is evident that in most, if not all, cases the symptoms of the disease do not manifest themselves until after a long period of exposure to silica dust and that an individual may not become aware of any disability until long after he has ceased work.—Henson v. Department of Labor and Industries, 130 P.2d 885, 886, 15 Wash.2d 384.

(7) "Chronic diseases, such as silicosis, have an insidious and always unrecognized beginning. They progress slowly for a long period, without suspicion of their presence."—Golden v. Lerch Bros., 300 N.W. 207, 211, 211 Minn. 30.

Intensity of dust concentration

"'In general it may be said that in individuals working in dust containing 5,000,000 particles of pure silica per cubic foot it would require from five to twenty years for the development of demonstrable silicosis. . . . Concentrations of dust in which there are more than 100,000,000 particles per cubic foot of air are extremely hazardous, and this has been called by Cummings the "secondary threshold," a value above which silicosis might be expected to develop with great rapidity. Under such conditions nodular fibrosis might occur in as short a time as two years. As a general rule from fifteen to twenty years working exposure to fifteen or twenty million particles of pure crystalline silica are required to produce demonstrable silicosis.' The shortness of breath seldom reaches a degree sufficient to dis-

by decreased chest expansion,[74] lessened capacity for work,[75] absence of fever,[76] increased susceptibility to tuberculosis,[77] and some or all of these symptoms may be present.[78] These symptoms are due to nodular fibrosis rather evenly distributed throughout both lungs, which reduces the lung air space and lessens the elasticity of the pulmonary tissues.[79] There are also certain characteristic X-ray findings or changes.[80]

Silicosis is an incurable disease,[83] and there is no treatment for it.[84] All hope to stem the disease lies in preventive measures to decrease the concentration of dust in plants where the disease is a hazard.[85] Not only is the disease incurable, but, if continued, it is fatal.[86] Distressing shortness of breath and finally plain suffocation may result from silicosis,[87] but the disease predisposes to tuberculosis,[88] and tuberculosis is quite frequently a complication of silicosis.[89] It has been said that three fourths of the people afflicted with silicosis die from tuberculosis, fifteen per cent die from pneumonia; enlarged hearts from attempting to force blood through hardening arteries complete the story.[90]

SILK. The fine, soft thread produced by various species of caterpillars; and hence thread spun, or cloth woven, from the above-named material.[91] In turb the patient, except when sudden violent exercise by creating a sudden demand for large amounts of oxygen causes dyspnea. The dizziness, general weakness, and headache often mentioned as symptoms of silicosis are indirect results of this dyspnea. —Henson v Department of Labor and Industries, supra.

Three stages

"According to the medical authorities, the disease is divided into first, second, and third stages 'The symptoms of uncomplicated first-stage silicosis are few and often indefinite. The man may apparently be quite well and his working capacity not noticeably impaired Slight shortness of breath on exertion and some unproductive cough, often with recurrent colds, are the most usual symptoms The man may have a little less ability to expand his chest than formerly, and the elasticity of the chest may be slightly impaired The earliest specific indication of the presence of silicosis is the radiographic appearance, consisting of generalized arborization throughout both lung fields with more or less small, discrete mottling.' The symptoms of the second stage are usually as follows: 'A definite shortness of breath on exertion is usually found, and pains in the chest are a frequent complaint A dry morning cough is often present, sometimes with vomiting; and recurrent colds are more frequent Even then the man's appearance may be healthy, but he is dyspneic on exertion, he cannot work as well as formerly, his chest expansion is noticeably decreased, the movement being sluggish and diminished in elasticity. The characteristic radiographic appearance is a generalized medium-sized mottling throughout both lung fields. The shadows of the individual nodules are for the most part discrete and well-defined on a background of fibrous arborization, but there may be here and there larger but limited opacities due to irregular pleural thickening or to a localized aggregation of nodules.' Similarly expressed

Silicosis follows a definite course, with a period of onslaught, then increasing severity in which the normal lung tissue is gradually replaced by fibrous or scar tissue over each particle of dust lodged in the lung, and military tuberculosis usually ensues, together with other complications, before death occurs.—Svoboda v Mandler, 275 N.W. 599, 600, 133 Neb. 433

its widest and most comprehensive sense the word denotes the substance or material which comes from the raw silk, whatever be its quality.[92]

As used in railroad terminology, the word "sill" and the term "sill step" are defined in Railroads § 1 r.

SILO. A receptacle intended to preserve and store forage in edible condition, to be used during the winter and the spring;[94] a structure or vat for the storage of fodder harvested from the field and for its conversion into ensilage to be used for food for live stock.[95] A silo is a part of the regular equipment of most farms which support any considerable amount of stock and is an important instrument in the ordinary process of husbandry.[96]

SILT. Mud, or fine earth, deposited from running or standing water.[97]

SILVER. A white metallic element, sonorous, ductile, very malleable, and capable of a high degree of polish.[98] The term is employed also in referring to a medium of exchange in use in this country.[99]

SIMILAR. The word "similar" is a qualifying adjective,[1] and is derived from the Latin "similis," meaning "like."[2] It is a word of common use,[3] and not a legal term,[4] but it has received frequent and extended attention from the courts.[5]

By reason of the fact that the word "similar" has in use and according to lexicographers two distinct meanings,[6] both of which have been recognized by the courts,[7] the dictionary definitions are said to be unsatisfactory,[8] and, since the word is ambiguous[9] and has no inflexible content,[10] the meaning it conveys to the mind of the ordinary reader usually is a question for the jury to determine.[11]

As ordinarily used, the word "similar" implies an allowance for some degree of difference,[12] and a reference to some standard of comparison, itself determined by the context.[13] Thus the word is often used to denote partial resemblance,[14] and is generally interpreted to mean that one thing has a resemblance in many respects, nearly corresponds, is somewhat like, or has a general likeness, to some or degree;[32] of the same scope, order, or purpose;[33] having characteristics in common;[34] like in form, appearance, size, qualities, relations, etc.;[35] analogous.[36] It is also defined as meaning having a resemblance;[37] resembling;[38] with more or less resemblance;[39] having a more or less marked resemblance[40] or correspondence[41] to each other[42] or one another[43] or to something else;[44] bearing resemblance to one another or to something else.[45]

As defined in the preceding paragraphs, the word "similar" does not have the significance of, or mean, the same,[46] or identical,[47] or precisely alike;[48] and it does not mean identical in form and substance,[49] and it has been said that generally the word "similar" does not mean identical or exactly alike.[50] However, at times the word "similar" is construed as meaning the same or identical,[51] and it is often used to denote sameness in all essential particulars.[52] Thus the word "similar" is defined as meaning exactly alike;[53] precisely alike;[54] precisely like;[55] exactly corresponding;[56] identical;[57] resembling in all respects.[58]

It has also been said that the word "similar" connotes homogeneity,[59] and means homogeneous; uniform.[60]

"Similar" has been held to be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "like" see 53 C.J.S. p 885 note 80, and "same" see 78 C.J.S. p 578 note 12.

It has been compared with, or distinguished from, "equivalent" see 30 C J.S. p 1132 note 12, and "same" see 78 C.J S. p 578 note 13.

SIMILARITY. The courts have frequently stated that similarity is not identity, but resemblance between different things,[61] and similarity does not mean identical, but having a resemblance,[62] and it has even been said that it includes only the idea of casual likeness.[63]

SIMILITER. A Latin term meaning likewise; the like.[64]

In pleading, it is the name of the short formula used either at the end of pleadings or by itself, expressive of the acceptance of an issue of fact by the opposite party; otherwise termed a "joinder of issue,"[65] and treated in this connection in Pleading § 513.

SIMILITUDE. The word is derived from the Latin "similitudo,"[66] and means likeness in constitution, qualities, or appearance; similarity; resemblance.[67]

SIMILITUDO. As the first word of a maxim as to which there have been no recent applications see 58 C.J. p 735 note 10.

SIMONIA. As the first word of a maxim as to which there have been no recent applications see 58 C.J. p 735 note 11.

SIMONY. In English ecclesiastical law the crime of buying or selling ecclesiastical preferment or the corrupt presentation of anyone to an ecclesiastical benefice for money or reward,[68] of which the common law does not take notice to punish it.[69]

SIMPLE. Pure; unmixed; not compounded; not aggravated; not evidenced by sealed writing or record.[70] It has been held to be synonymous with "mere" see 57 C.J. p 1067 note 25.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note,[71] and for additional phrases as to which more recent adjudications have not been found see 58 C.J. p 735 notes 19–35.

SIMPLEX. Simple; single; pure; unqualified.[72]

As the first word of maxims as to which there have been no recent applications see 58 C J. p 735 notes 39, 40.

SIMPLICITAS. As the first word of a maxim as to which there have been no recent applications see 58 C.J. p 735 note 41.

SIMULATE. The courts, in interpreting the word "simulate," have given to it a definition which corresponds with that of the lexicographers,[75] and it has been taken to mean the assumption by someone or something of an appearance which is feigned, false, deceptive, or counterfeit.[76] It is defined as meaning to assume the mere appearance of, without the reality;[77] to assume the signs or indications of falsely; to counterfeit; feign; imitate.[78]

Simulated. Counterfeited; feigned; pretended.[79]

SIMULATION. A simulation is a sham, a myth;[80] a feigned, pretended act; one which assumes the appearance without the reality;[81] the act of simulating, or assuming an appearance which is feigned, or not true; counterfeiting.[82]

A transaction which involves some consideration,[83] even though inadequate,[84] is not a simulation.

In French law, a simulation is collusion; a fraudulent arrangement between two or more persons to give a false or deceptive appearance to a transaction in which they engage.[85]

SIMULTANEOUS. A word of comparison[86] signifying that two or more occurrences or happenings are identical in time,[87] and defined to mean taking place or operating at the same time.[88] It has been distinguished from "contemporaneous" see 16 C.J.S. p 1526 note 19.

Applied to machinery, the word has some elasticity[89] and does not necessarily imply absolute synchronism[90] from beginning to end.[91]

SIMULTANEOUSLY. In its strict sense the word "simultaneously" means at precisely the same instant.[92] The word also means at the same time,[93] and it may have this meaning when used in its strict sense,[94] or when used in a broader sense,[95] and when used in its broad sense it does not mean at the same instant, but at substantially the same time,[96] and it does not require absolute synchronism from beginning to end.[97] When the word is used to describe the operation of parts of a machine it can readily be construed to mean that the parts operate unitedly, harmoniously, and in concord.[98]

SINCE. The proper[99] and primary[1] signification of the word "since" is after;[2] from the time that.[3] It is also defined as meaning from the time of;[4] from a definite past time until now.[5]

The word "since" is further defined as meaning during or within the time after; ever after, or at a time after; from and after the time, occurrence, or existence of;[6] and it has been said that this is the meaning of the word when used as a preposition.[7]

"Since" is also defined as meaning in the time passed, counting backward from the present; before this or now; from any time forward to the present.[8]

In its appropriate sense,[9] the word "since" includes the whole period between an event and the present time,[10] and, while it denotes during the whole time after an event, it may denote any particular time during that period.[11]

When the word "since" is used with reference to a certain date it ordinarily does not include that date.[12]

The decisions are not in accord as to whether the word "since" may properly be used to denote future time. On the one hand, it has been said that "since" necessarily refers to something past, and never extends into the future,[13] while on the other hand it is said that the word "since" is not always limited in meaning to the time between the present and a certain past event, or to a space of time between two certain events, for it sometimes reaches beyond the present and embraces future time.[14]

"Since" has been held to be synonymous with "subsequent,"[15] but it has also been pointed out that there is a distinction between the terms.[16]

SINCERE. Being in reality as in appearance; not assumed, feigned, or pretended; real; true; genuine.[17] It has been held to be synonymous with "true."[18]

SINE. A Latin word meaning "without."[19] It is the first word of various Latin phrases.[20]

SINTER. To become or cause to become a coherent mass by heating without thoroughly melting.[33]

SINUS. A channel for the passage of blood, which has not the coats of an ordinary blood-vessel; such are the blood-passages in the gravid uterus or those in the cerebral meninges.[34] Also, a hollow in bone or other tissue; antrum.[35]

The term is also applied to a fistula or tract leading to a suppurating cavity.[36]

SIPING. To ooze or distil very gently as liquids do through a cask which is not quite tight.[37]

SIRUP; SYRUP. The word "sirup" is defined generally as meaning a thick, sweet liquid;[38] and, more specifically, as any concentrated, more or less viscid aqueous solution of sugar;[39] a saturated solution of sugar in water,[40] often combined with some medicinal substance, or flavored, as with the juice of fruits, for use in confections, cookery, or the preparation of beverages;[41] a thick and viscid liquid, made from the juice of fruits, herbs, etc., boiled with sugar.[42] Hence any concentrated, more or less viscid, aqueous solution of sugar, either without admixture, as the simple sirup of pharmacy, or variously flavored or medicated, or obtained in an incompletely refined state, as in the manufacture of cane sugar or of glucose;[43] a solution of sugar in water, made according to an official formula, whether simple, flavored, or medicated with some special therapeutic or compound.[44]

As defined by the United States Department of Agriculture, "sirup" is the product obtained by purifying and evaporating the juice of a sugar producing plant without removing any of the sugar.[45]

As commonly and properly understood and applied to articles of food for table use, "sirup" has an accepted meaning, as designating articles of food which are in common use as table sirups.[46]

"Sirup," as used in a freight tariff, as an addendum to "molasses," has a narrower meaning than that of a saturated solution of sugar in water, often combined with some medicinal substance or flavored, as with the juice of fruits, for use in confections, cookery, or the preparation of beverages;[47] it includes only food sirups in competition as such with molasses, and does not include a sirup used merely as the basis for a beverage.[48]

There are a large number of sirups, each of which is named from that ingredient which gives it flavor or character, and the word "sirup" is necessarily qualified by that of the substance, or one or more of the substances, which distinguish it to the taste or give it its medicinal property.[49]

SISTER. The popular and ordinary meaning of the word "sister" is well-settled and definite,[50] and the term is defined as meaning a female born of the same parents;[51] a female whose parents are the same as those of another person;[52] a woman who has the same father and mother with another, or one of them only;[53] a female person considered in her relation to another person having the same parents,[54] or one parent in common.[55]

If both parents are the same the woman is simply called "sister,"[56] or "whole sister;"[57] if but one parent is the same she is called "half sister."[58]

Thus the word "sister" embraces a sister of the half blood as well as of the whole blood.[59]

The term has been construed as not including a person adopted by decedent's parents[60] or a sister-in-law.[61]

"Sister" is the correlative of "brother" as stated in 12 C.J.S. p 373 note 22.

Provision for the payment of insurance benefits to the sisters of deceased soldiers was not made under the War Risk Insurance Act, but was made under the National Service Life Insurance Act, and decisions under both acts on this point are treated in Army and Navy § 85 b(2)(b).

SISTER-HOOK. See Clip Hooks, 15 C.J.S. p 1275 notes 15, 16.

SIT. The verb "sit" is defined generally as meaning to have or keep a seat or good seat upon; to place on a seat; to rest, as upon a chair or other support, with the body bent at the hips, and the spine nearly vertical; rest upon the haunches; take or occupy a seat.[62]

In a more specific sense, the word "sit" means to hold court;[63] to hold a session, as of a court;[64] to preside, or do any act of a judicial nature.[65]

SITE. A plot of ground suitable or set apart for some specific use;[66] a seat or ground plot.[67]

The term does not of itself necessarily mean a place or tract of land fixed by definite boundaries;[68]

58 C.J. p 741 note 11.

The word "situated" clearly implies some element of permanency,[88] and contemplates more than mere temporary presence,[89] and connotes a more or less permanent location or situs,[90] and it has been said that by a long line of authorities the word at least includes residence.[91]

SITUATION. The state of being placed; posture;[92] position as regards conditions and circumstances; state; condition.[93]

"Situation" has been held to be synonymous with "office" see Officers § 1 a, "position" see 72 C J.S. p 231 note 56, and "situs,"[94] and it has been compared with, or distinguished from, "cause" see 14 C.J.S. p 42 note 5.

SITUS. The word "situs" is defined as meaning site;[95] situation;[96] location;[97] the place where a thing is.[98] While it is said that permanency of location is not required to fix situs,[99] yet the term does import fixedness of location.[1]

In its natural signification, the word "situs" is applicable only to landed estates which are really fixed and immovable.[2] Strictly speaking, personal property cannot be said to have a situs; it is situated wherever it may happen to be for the time being.[3] It has been said that the word "situs," in the case of intangibles, now signifies power or jurisdiction over such intangibles rather than its old connotation of location.[4] However, the word "situs" is applied conventionally to personal property,[5] and in many instances and for many reasons it is necessary to ascertain the situs of such property. In any situation concerning personal property where more than one jurisdiction is or may be involved, the law which governs may depend on the situs of the property, and, since this is essentially a question of conflicting jurisdictions, the subject is treated generally in Conflict of Laws § 18, and specifically in various titles throughout this work under the heading "What law governs."

For taxation purposes it is frequently necessary to determine the situs of personal property since, as stated in the C.J S title Taxation § 114, also 61 C.J. p 223 notes 97, 98, in order to be taxable, personal property must have a taxable situs within the state, either actual or constructive.

Statutes frequently require that chattel mortgages, mechanics' liens, conditional sales contracts, and other instruments of a similar nature shall be recorded in the place where the property is situated or has its situs, and what constitutes the situs of the property or the place where the property is situated within the meaning of such statutes is treated with respect to chattel mortgages in Chattel Mortgages § 151, and with respect to mechanics' liens in Mechanics' Liens § 138, and with respect to conditional sales contracts in Sales § 584 c 1.

of personal property for reasons of venue, since actions involving such property frequently are required to be brought in the county where the property is situated. This subject is treated generally in the C J.S. title Venue §§ 47–50, also 67 C.J. p 72 note 27–p 75 note 81. The subject is treated more specifically in the various titles throughout this work, and, by way of illustration, in some jurisdictions statutes provide that a suit against an insurance company for loss of, or damage to, personal property be brought in the county where the insured property is situated, and what constitutes the county where such property is situated within the meaning of such statutes is treated in Insurance § 1252.

The distinction between photographs and skiagraphs is discussed in 70 C.J.S. p 698 note 56.

SKIASCOPE. The skiascope, sometimes called a "retinoscope," is a small circular mirror, plane or slightly concave, which reflects a beam of light into the pupil of the eye. Slight horizontal or vertical movements of the instrument produce a shadow which travels across the pupil in the same or in the opposite direction to the movement of the skiascope, according to the state of the refraction. The examiner looks through a small circular opening in the center of the mirror. Trial lenses are now placed before the eye until one is found which neutralizes or reverses the direction in which the shadow moves. This lens indicates the refractive condition at a particular meridian and enables the examiner to ascertain the amount not only of corneal but also of lenticular astigmatism.[17]

SKILL. It has been said that "skill" is not a static term,[19] and that there are different degrees of skill.[20]

The term is defined as meaning the familiar knowledge of any art or science, united with readiness and dexterity in execution or performance, or in the application of the art or science to practical purposes.[21] In its broadest signification the term includes every subject susceptible of special and peculiar knowledge derived from experience,[22] and it is not necessarily limited only to mechanical or professional knowledge,[23] and is equally applicable to a chemist as to a mechanic, and to a laboratory as to a work-bench.[24]

While the word "skill" may, it does not necessarily, or even usually, include the idea of care or diligence.[25]

Persons performing the duties of agent, broker, factor, or trustee are required to exercise a certain degree of skill, and in this connection see Agency §§ 155–161, Brokers § 26, Factors § 20, and the C.J.S. title Trusts § 247, also 65 C.J. p 648 note 9–p 650 note 28.

A person of sufficient skill in a particular field of endeavor may be permitted, in a proper case, to testify as an expert witness, and the skill which is required to qualify a person as an expert witness is treated with reference to civil actions in Evidence § 457, and with reference to criminal actions in Criminal Law § 858 c.

It is stated in Gaming § 1 b (2) that the law recognizes a difference between games of skill and games of chance, games of skill usually being lawful, while gambling by any species of game of chance is generally considered unlawful.

The word "skill" is treated in various other connections throughout this work and reference is made to the indexes to the titles Attorney and Client, Master and Servant, and Physicians and Surgeons. For other specific references consult the Descriptive-Word Index.

b. Nature, origin, and legality of slavery

a. Definitions

A slave has been defined as a person who is wholly subject to the will of another; a person who is the chattel or property of another and is wholly subject to his will. Slavery is defined as the state of entire subjection of one person to the will of another; a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another.

A slave has been defined as a person who is wholly subject to the will of another, one who has no freedom of action but whose person and services are wholly under the control of another;[1] a person who is the chattel or property of another and is wholly subject to his will.[2]

Master has been defined as one who has another or others under his immediate control, a lord paramount or employer of slaves.[3]

The term "overseer," with reference to slaves, has been defined as a person who, as the agent or employee of another, has a right to command the obedience, and is entitled to the services, of the slave placed under his charge,[4] a person who superintends and manages the slaves of others, and directs their labors.[5]

Slavery is defined as the state of entire subjection of one person to the will of another;[6] a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another.[7] The term implies the relationship of two persons in the character of master and slave.[8]

b. Nature, Origin, and Legality of Slavery

The law of African slavery in the United States was a system of customary law. While slavery was largely a matter of municipal regulation, to the extent that the Constitution of the United States recognized a property in slaves, the institution of slavery was a political institution.

Our American law of African slavery was a system of customary law, that is, of rules and principles applicable to the institution, at first introduced and observed by the people in their practical dealing with the subject, and subsequently recognized by the courts as the grounds of judicial decision. Very few of these principles were the result of written law, but had been developed from time to time by the actual working of the system in the several slave states, and successively adopted by the courts as they had been found by experience to be proper and effective in making the institution answer the purpose for which it existed,[9] and it was held that slavery could legally exist without any positive law authorizing it, its very existence in fact being presumptive evidence of its legality.[10] While slavery as between the separate states was largely a matter of municipal regulation,[11] and by the law of nations no state was bound to recognize slavery in another state, it being a matter of comity,[12] to the extent that the Constitution of the United States recognized a property in slaves, the institution of slavery was a political institution.[13]

Our system resembled that of the Romans rather than the villeinage of the ancient common law, and the courts have looked to the Roman rather than to the old common law of England for rules applicable to it,[14] and the common law of England was held to be inapplicable to the institution of slavery except to protect the rights of masters, for African slavery never existed in the island of Great Britain by the common law, by statute, or by the law of nations.[15] Under the Roman law slavery could originate in three ways, namely, by birth, when the mother was a slave; by captivity, in war, and by the voluntary sale of himself, as a slave, by a freeman, over the age of twenty, for the sake of sharing the price.[16] In the United States slavery by captivity in war was unknown[17] except in the instance of Indians taken in war, as discussed infra § 3 a, and a free negro could not sell himself into slavery,[18] the chief means of perpetuating slavery being by birth, as considered infra § 3 a.

§ 2. —— Slave Trade

Although the slave trade was in some states recognized as a lawful commerce under the law of nations, statutes prohibiting the trade were enacted in many states and by the federal government.

Although the slave trade was in some states recognized as a lawful commerce under the law of nations, and that law was held obligatory on the states unless repudiated by treaty or positive law,[19] persons imported as slaves contrary to law, against their will, were still subject to federal control, although mingled with persons in the states;[20] and in many states statutes were passed prohibiting slave trade and the importation of slaves, and sometimes rendering a slave free on his importation.[21]

Acts were passed by the federal government making the engaging in the slave trade an indictable offense against the United States, and forfeiting the vessel.[22] The acts prohibited not merely the transportation of slaves, but the being employed in the business of the slave trade or serving on such a voyage,[23] or fitting vessels for use in the trade,[24] and it was unlawful to hold, sell, or dispose of an African illegally brought into the country from any foreign kingdom, place, or country;[25] engaging in such commerce was under certain circumstances made piracy by federal statutes, as discussed in Piracy § 1 b (2). The acts were not, however, intended to apply to cases where slaves were carried from one foreign port to another as passengers and not for sale,[26] and they were not applicable to negroes domiciled in the United States and brought back to the United States after a temporary absence.[27] One held in slavery in a foreign country who became free by being brought into the United States in violation of statute, and afterward remained in the service of his previous owner, both owner and slave believing that the latter had not obtained his freedom, could not recover compensation for such service on an implied promise, but only on an express promise, to pay.[28]

§ 3. Who Were Slaves or Subject to Be Made Slaves

a. In general
b. Evidence of status

a. In General

What persons were slaves or subject to be made such depended largely on the provisions of regulatory statutes. Generally, the children of mothers who were slaves were also slaves.

Slavery being the subject of statutory regulation in some jurisdictions, what persons were slaves or subject to be made such depended largely on the construction of those statutes.[29] The children of a slave followed the condition of the mother at the time of the birth, according to the maxim, partus sequitur ventrem,[30] and the law did not contemplate that any number of crosses between the negro and the white should emancipate the offspring of the slave.[31] Conversely, the child of a free woman was free,[32] and where a female slave was emancipated, with a reservation that her future increase should be slaves, such reservation was void, and the woman and her increase were absolutely free.[33] In some jurisdictions statutes were operative which rendered free children born after the passage of the statute.[34]

Although some cases seemed to lean to a different doctrine,[35] it was generally held that children born of a slave mother entitled to or promised her freedom at the end of a fixed time were born slaves and so continued even after the mother obtained her freedom,[36] and the issue of manumitted slaves born after the manumission, before the period of its taking full effect, were slaves for life,[37] and the cases in which children, born before their mothers' right to freedom accrued, have been adjudged to be free, were said to be so decided, not because of a prospective gift or bequest of freedom to the mothers, but because of some clause in the instrument being construed as extending the gift or bequest of freedom to the children themselves.[38]

Where a person was born free, no length of illegal and usurped dominion over him could make him a slave,[39] and although a free negro sold his services by deed for ninety-nine years, for a valuable consideration, he did not thereby cease to be a free man.[40] A father could not hold his own children in slavery, or sell them as slaves, although he might have rescued them from the condition of slavery.[41]

b. Evidence of Status

In slave states color indicating African descent gave rise to a presumption that the person was a slave. On an issue of slavery or freedom the general rules of evidence have been applied.

In slave states color indicating African descent gave rise to a presumption that the person was a slave.[42] Every negro was prima facie to be considered as a slave and the property of somebody, and he who acted in respect of him, as if he were a free man, acted at his peril, and the burden of proof was on him to show that the negro was not a slave, or at least to show such circumstances as would rebut the presumption arising from color,[43] possession of, and acts of ownership over, a colored person, were regarded as prima facie evidence of slavery and ownership.[44] This, however, was not the rule in nonslave states or states in which, generally, colored persons were not held as slaves, and in these every person, although colored, was prima facie presumed to be free,[45] and a negro was presumed to be free, although purchased as a slave, if the purchase was made in a state in which slavery was not tolerated, unless it was shown that he had previously inhabited one in which it was.[46]

A deed or act of manumission of a slave might be presumed from such acts of the master as afforded a sufficient ground for the presumption,[47] as where the master allowed him to act as a freeman without molestation for many years;[48] but the rule was that the presumption of a deed of manumission must be founded on acts inconsistent with a state of slavery, known to the owner, and which could only be accounted for on a supposition that he intended to free his slave.[49] A deed of emancipation, executed in a state where slavery did not exist, was prima facie good, and entitled the negroes to freedom wherever they went; and the proof of its invalidity must come from those who disputed the act and attempted to hold against it.[50]

On an issue of slavery or freedom the general rules of evidence,[51] including rules as to admissibility[52] and weight and sufficiency[53] of evidence, have been applied.

§ 4. Property in Slaves

a. General nature; rights and duties of master
b. Transfer
c. Loaning and hiring

a. General Nature; Rights and Duties of Master

Slaves were considered as property and were recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States. The master had the right to use such means as were necessary in enforcing his authority, but he was under a legal obligation to supply the necessary wants of the slave and to protect and preserve his life.

Slaves were considered as property[54] and were recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States.[55] For some purposes in some states they were considered as real property,[56] particularly for purposes of descent, as discussed in Descent and Distribution § 9; but the law, which to some extent imparted to slaves the fictitious quality of realty, for most purposes, and to a greater extent, considered them personalty.[57] Slaves were subject to attachment.[58]

The master's property in his slave was sui generis, the slave being considered in the law in many respects in the light of a human being entitled to the law's protection.[59] Thus, although unconditional submission on the part of the slave was due to the lawful authority of the master, and the master might therefore use just such force and means in reducing his rebellious slave to lawful submission to his authority as were necessary to effect his purpose,

(2) They were not, however, real estate —Girard v. New Orleans, 2 La. Ann 897.

(3) The view was expressed that slaves in Louisiana, being immovables under the law of Louisiana, passed as real estate, although by the law of the domicile of the owner slaves were personalty.—McCollum v. Smith, Meigs, Tenn, 342, 33 Am.D 147.

even to the destruction of the life or limb of the slave,[60] he might not deprive the slave of life or limb unless impelled to such an act by necessity;[61] and he had no right to inflict on him such cruel and inhuman punishment, even with the purpose of securing service and obedience, as must result in death as a consequence of the punishment inflicted.[62] Likewise, the law did not subject the female slave to an involuntary and illicit connection with her master, and it would protect her against such a misfortune.[63] The owner of a slave was under a legal obligation to supply his necessary wants and to protect and preserve his life,[64] and this duty terminated only with the termination of the slave's life.[65]

An action would lie by the owner against one who held his slave wrongfully,[66] or enticed,[67] harbored, or concealed,[68] or rescued[69] him, or who aided or allowed him to escape,[70] and trespass or other appropriate action would lie for the master against one who beat, injured, or caused the death of his slave.[71] In some jurisdictions it was made a criminal offense, generally felony, to steal, kidnap, or harbor or conceal a slave with the intent to deprive the owner of his possession.[72]

The responsibility of a common carrier in transporting slaves was of the nature of that assumed in carrying passengers, and not goods or property; if loss occurred, the carrier was responsible only for negligence or unskillfulness.[73] Carriers were liable in many states, under statute, to the master of a slave for taking him as a passenger without his owner's consent or unaccompanied by the owner, and thus aiding his escape,[74] and in some cases the carrier was liable to fine and imprisonment.[75]

b. Transfer

Slaves could be transferred by will, gift, or sale, and they could also be mortgaged or pledged as security.

actual delivery.[80] Slaves could also be mortgaged[81] or pledged as security for a debt.[82]

Slaves could be sold,[83] under some statutes, by sale and delivery without deed or writing,[84] but under other statutes a deed or writing was necessary,[85] and it was required to be recorded in order to have effect against third persons,[86] but not as between the parties.[87] The general rules governing warranties, latent defects, and rescission of sales applied.[88] An attempted sale of a person as a slave after slavery was abolished was an absolute nullity;[89] but no retroactive force was attributed to the subsequent emancipation of slaves and abolition of slavery, so as to make a prior sale unlawful.[90]

Under some statutes, the peaceable possession of slaves for a specified period was sufficient to give the possessor the right of property in such slaves.[91]

c. Loaning and Hiring

The loaning or hiring out of a slave was permissible.

Slaves could be lent[92] or hired out[93] in like manner as other chattels, and the hiring might similarly be rescinded or terminated.[94] The borrower or hirer was responsible for loss[95] or conversion[96] of the slave, or for wrongfully chastising or injuring,[97] or killing, or causing the death of,[98] the slave; and the hirer was responsible for the hire of the slave and for breach of his contract of hiring in like manner as in any case of hiring of chattels.[99]

§ 5. Fugitive Slave Laws

Statutes known generally as fugitive slave laws had as their object the prevention of the escape of slaves and the reclamation of fugitive slaves.

In some states statutes were enacted known generally as fugitive slave laws having for an object the prevention of the escape of slaves and their reclamation, and the punishment of those who aided or assisted a slave to escape or harbored him.[1] Furthermore, the United States Constitution guaranteed to the owner of an escaped slave the right of reclamation,[2] and the Constitution did not leave the enforcement of the provisions for the reclamation of slaves solely with the states, but it vested that power in the federal government.[3] Thus, similar statutes were passed by the federal government, the principal ones in 1793 and 1850, the latter known specifically as The Fugitive Slave Law,[4] and these were held not repugnant to the Constitution;[5] and, indeed, in many instances, the state laws facilitating the recapture of fugitive slaves found within the limits of that state were held void because they assumed to legislate on subject matter over which congress had exclusive jurisdiction,[6] although similar acts not in conflict with the United States legislation were upheld.[7]

The citizen of a slave state had a right, under the Constitution and laws of the Union, to have his fugitive slave delivered on claim being made, and no state could defeat or obstruct this right,[8] and no person had a right to oppose the master in reclaiming his slave, or to demand proof of his property.[9] Under the Constitution the master or his agent had a right to seize, without warrant, his slave in any state where he might be found, if he could do so without a breach of the peace,[10] using as much force as was necessary to carry him back to his residence,[11] or he could enforce his right in the appropriate court by warrant and commitment or certificate.[12] Some statutes provided for the sale of apprehended fugitive slaves after a stated period and on publication of their commitment, the sale being for the benefit of the owner and to pay for the slave's keep.[13]

§ 6. Regulation of Slaves, Freedmen, and Other Negroes

In some states special statutes pertaining to registration or regulation of slaves or free negroes were enacted, and some statutes prohibited immigration of free negroes or importation of slaves into the state.

By statute in some states the slave was required to be registered,[14] slave patrols were authorized with police power over slaves,[15] and an overseer was required on slave plantations if there were more than a specified number of slaves there.[16] Slaves and free negroes were very generally prohibited from carrying arms.[17] Under some statutes it was a criminal offense to trade or deal with a slave without his master's consent,[18] to sell him intoxicants, as discussed in Intoxicating Liquors § 257; to incite in slaves a spirit of insurrection, rebellion, conspiracy, or discontent,[19] or to permit slaves to go at large and hire themselves out or to engage in business.[20] The power conferred on municipal authorities to provide for licensing and regulating drays did not empower such authorities to prohibit the driving of drays by slaves.[21]

Some statutes were enacted to prevent the immigration of free negroes into the several states, and making the coming into the state a penal offense,[22] and the importation of slaves into many of the states was a punishable offense even though from one state to another,[23] since the provision of the United States Constitution which restrained congress from prohibiting the importation of slaves did not apply to the state governments.[24]

§ 7. Status and Civil Rights and Liabilities

a. In general
b. Rights of property of slaves
c. Inheritance from or through slaves
d. Contracts by or with slaves
e. Torts by slaves
f. Actions by or against slaves

a. In General

Generally, a slave had no civil, social, or political rights or capacity, except those conferred on him by statute.

Subject to certain qualifications or limitations, in accordance with the general rule stated supra § 4 a, a slave in all relations and in all matters was regarded by the law as property;[25] he had no civil, social, or political rights or capacity whatever, except such as were bestowed on him by statute,[26] and every attempt to extend to a slave positive rights was held to be an attempt to reconcile inherent contradictions, for, in the very nature of things, he was held subject to despotism.[27]

b. Rights of Property of Slaves

As a general rule, a slave could not acquire or hold title to property or any interest therein.

While the right of a slave to take property under the provisions of a particular statute was recognized,[28] with respect to property rights the general rule was that the possession of the slave was the possession of the master, and any property which the former acquired belonged to the latter,[29] and a slave could acquire no rights under a deed which either a court of law or of equity could enforce.[30] A devise or bequest to a slave was very generally held to be void,[31] and a bequest or devise in trust for a slave was not enforced for his benefit, but the bequest lapsed and fell into the general residuum of the estate for distribution,[32] a slave could not inherit,[33] and his owner could not derive title to any property bequeathed or devised to a slave.[34] In some cases a legacy given to a slave was held not void, but it could not be recovered from the executor by the slave or his master, and it escheated to the state.[35]

The view was taken that a conveyance to a white person and to a slave, on the payment of the purchase price by the slave, transferred legal title to the white person which he held in trust for the slave who would be entitled to enforce his rights as cestui que trust on acquiring his freedom.[36]

c. Inheritance from or through Slaves

Generally, there was no right of inheritance from or through slaves.

While the view was taken that property which a slave, whose marriage was validated by statute, was authorized to take by a particular statute might pass by inheritance to his children,[37] generally, persons in slavery were incapable of contracting marriage, as shown in Marriage § 14, and the offspring of such persons had no inheritable blood,[38] in the

In Alabama

(1) The view was expressed, in a case which was decided after the abolition of slavery, that a testamentary gift in trust for the benefit of slaves of the testator was not void, where there was no attempt by the testator to emancipate such slaves.—Marsh's Adm'r v. Richardson's Adm'r, 49 Ala. 430.

(2) In earlier cases, however, it was held or recognized that a testamentary gift in trust for the benefit of slaves of the testator, whom he, by his will, attempted to emancipate, was invalid.—Pool v. Harrison, 18 Ala. 514.—58 C.J. p. 757 note 36.

Status of offspring

(1) The view has been expressed that the children of a slave marriage or cohabitation were not in law bastards, but were generally regarded merely as not having the right of inheritance, their parents not being husband and wife by contract under law, and slaves not being legally competent to contract marriages.—Christopher v. Mungen, 55 So. 273, 61 Fla. 513.—7 C.J. p. 939 note 16 [c].

(2) In Tennessee, however, it has been stated that persons born of parents while in slavery were regarded as bastards.—Cole v. Taylor, 177 S.W. 61, 132 Tenn. 92.—Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Jordan, 184 S.W.2d 721, 28 Tenn. App. 11.

(3) In some earlier cases in Tennessee, the view was taken that the children of a slave marriage entered into with the consent of the ownabsence of a legitimatizing statute passed subsequent to emancipation, or unless the parties to such marriage lived and cohabited as man and wife at the time of or after emancipation [39] The children of a slave, born during slavery, were not such heirs as would prevent the escheat of his property in the event of his death intestate after he had obtained his freedom,[40] but after their emancipation inheritance could be had through slaves,[41] and the issue of a slave marriage, although the parents died before the emancipation, were lawful heirs of their father.[42]

d. Contracts by or with Slaves

A slave could not contract, and an attempted contract neither imposed obligations nor conferred rights on either party,[43] unless made with the consent of his master,[44] and a contract made by a slave could not be enforced on his becoming a freedman.[45] However, where a slave was permitted by his owner to exercise his own discretion in the employment of his time, acting really as a freeman, it was held that such owner could not recover from a third person the proceeds of property which the slave had acquired, and which had come into the hands of such third person as the agent of a slave.[46] A master could not compel performance of a contract made by a slave with a third person.[47]

e. Torts by Slaves

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a master was not liable for injuries resulting from acts of his slave, unless the slave was acting in the course of the employment by the master or under his authority or direction.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the owner of a slave was not answerable for a willful and unauthorized trespass committed by his slave,[48] or for injuries caused by the negligent conduct of the slave while not acting in his employment or under his authority,[49] and the converse of both rules was also true.[50] If a slave committed a wrong for his master's benefit, but not at his command or request, and the master afterward ratified it, the master was liable,[51] but in some states the master might exonerate himself by surrendering the slave to the injured person.[52]

The view was taken that, while the hirer of a slave was not liable for the act of the slave which was willful, and not negligent or unskillful,[53] the hirer might be liable for injuries resulting from the negligence or unskillfulness of the slave while he was engaged in the functions or duties intrusted to him by the hirer.[54]

f. Actions by or against Slaves

A slave could not be a party in any civil action either as plaintiff or defendant, except when he had to claim or prove his freedom.[55] and battery,[58] larceny,[59] mayhem,[60] rape,[61] and homicide.[62] However, the slave undoubtedly had the natural right of self-preservation or self-defense,[63] although certain facts which as between whites might excuse or mitigate the offense did not so operate in the case of slaves,[64] and it was no justification of a slave, indicted for a criminal offense, that it was committed by his master's command.[65] In some states criminal statutes were enacted specially applicable to slaves.[66] For an offense committed when a slave, a man could not be legally convicted and punished as a freeman.[67]

Concealing or carrying away slave charged with capital crime. By some statutes it was made an offense for the owner or person in charge of a slave who was charged with any capital crime to conceal or carry away such slave so that the slave could not be brought to punishment.[68]

Competency of jurors. A person whose only interest in slaves consisted of an undistributed share of an estate composed of slaves was not a slaveholder within the terms of a statute requiring a certain proportion of the jurors to be slaveholders on the trial of slaves for a capital offense.[69]

Punishment; indemnification of owner. The punishment of slaves was in general severer than the punishment of whites for like offenses.[70] When slaves committed crimes and were prosecuted in the name of the state, they were regarded as accountable beings, and not as things, and they might be punished as the law directed, irrespective of the wishes of the master,[71] since, when a slave committed a crime, the private rights of the master yielded to the superior rights of the state, and he could not legally obstruct his arrest, or assist his escape,[72] although, under some statutes, the master was entitled to compensation for the loss of the slave.[73] A slave convicted of manslaughter might be punished by burning in the hand and whipping,[74] and murder[75] or attempted murder[76] was punishable by death; a slave accessory before the fact to murder was liable to the death penalty.[77] A slave convicted of murder was put to death in the same manner as a white person.[78]

b. Offenses against Slaves

An offense against the life or limb of a slave was punishable as a criminal offense.

Although slaves were for most purposes regarded as property, their lives and safety were guarded and they were entitled to the protection of the criminal law, and an offense against their life or limb was punishable criminally.[79] Thus, assault and battery of a slave was a criminal offense,[80] and it was a criminal offense cruelly and inhumanly to cut, slash, beat, or ill-treat a slave,[81] to inflict other cruel or unusual punishment,[82] to neglect to provide proper food, clothes, or shelter,[83] or to kill him unjustifiably.[84] If the offense was dismemberment, the indictment was for mayhem, and if it was a killing, the indictment was for murder;[85] but a simple assault and battery on a slave was not an indictable offense, and such an assault, even with intent to murder him, was not an offense at common law,[86] although the owner of a slave who beat him cruelly, and exposed him, so beaten, to public view, was guilty of a misdemeanor even at common law.[87] An indictment would lie against any person who removed or attempted to remove from the state any slave having a suit pending for freedom.[88]

§ 9. Right to, and Proceedings for, Freedom in General

a. In general
b. Actions or proceedings to obtain freedom

a. In General

Among the methods by which a slave could be rendered free were purchase, prescription, want of registration as required by statute, exportation from, or importation into, the state in violation of statute, or illegal sale of the slave.

In some states failure to register slaves under the statute had the effect of freeing them,[89] in others they could become free by purchase,[90] and in some freedom was allowed to be acquired by prescription[91] if the master knew of the slave's place of residence during the period of prescription.[92] A slave could not become partially free.[93]

Removal from state; invalid importation or sale. In some states statutes were enacted prohibiting the exportation or removal of slaves from the state, and under these, in the event of such removal, the slave became free, at least if the owner participated in the exportation,[94] while under other statutes slaves brought into the several states to reside or for sale in violation of, or noncompliance with, laws governing importation were free.[95] The statutes did not generally apply to slaves brought in by travelers or temporary sojourners,[96] but a traveler bringing slaves into a state was required to pursue his journey with no unnecessary delay.[97] In some jurisdictions the presence of a slave in a free state with the master's consent created per se the condition of freedom,[98] and under some,[99] but not all,[1] statutes, a slave became free by merely being transported through the state. The owner could in some instances bring the slave into the state on taking a statutory oath.[2] In some jurisdictions illegal sales of slaves entitled them to their freedom.[3]

b. Actions or Proceedings to Obtain Freedom

The method of enforcing freedom provided for in the statutes was required to be strictly followed.

The method of enforcing the right to freedom provided for in the statutes was required to be strictly followed.[4] In some states an action of assumpsit for services rendered might be maintained by a person claimed as a slave, for the purpose of trying the question of freedom,[5] or trespass in the nature of ravishment of ward,[6] or bill in equity.[7] The cases relating to jurisdiction and venue,[8] procedure,[9] right to sue and leave of court,[10] parties,[11] pleadings,[12] or trial, judgment, or review[13] are of little more than historical interest.

The general rule was that a slave on securing his freedom was not entitled to damages or to recover for his services while held as a slave[14] unless he showed that defendant knew, or had good reason to believe, that he was a free man.[15]

§ 10. Manumission, Emancipation, and Abolition of Slavery

a. Manumission
b. Emancipation; abolition of slavery

a. Manumission

(1) In general
(2) Status and rights of manumitted slaves

(1) In General

Under some statutes manumission of a slave by his owner was permitted but under other statutes it was forbidden or strictly limited.

"Manumission" has been defined as the act of liberating a slave from bondage and giving him freedom.[16] The right of owners to manumit their slaves was dependent on statute, and under some statutes manumission was permitted[17] if the legislature or court assented,[18] while under other statutes it was forbidden or strictly limited.[19] The statutes were generally held to prohibit only the manumission of slaves within the state and to permit the sending of slaves out of the state to be manumitted,[20] and the owner of slaves might voluntarily take them to another state and emancipate and leave them there.[21]

In accordance with statutory provisions, a bequest to slaves or a direction or trust in a will for their emancipation was void,[22] and it was held that a slave could not be the cestui que trust of his own freedom, under a bequest of freedom, where a direct emancipation of the slave by will would be invalid;[23] but under other statutes the highly prized devise or bequest of freedom was permissible,[24] and manumission could be by deed or will,[25] although, if by deed, the deed was usually required to be acknowledged, proved in court, or recorded.[26] Some laws even permitted the slave to contract with his master for his freedom.[27] An owner of a slave, by voluntarily putting him as a substitute into the federal army in 1864, thereby emancipated him by his own act, and the slave thereby became free.[28]

Even where manumission was allowed the law sometimes permitted manumission only of such slaves as could work and gain a livelihood and often required security for their support, although the requirement of security was only a police regulation not affecting their freedom.[29] In order to accomplish a manumission of a slave the owner thereof was required to conform strictly to the formalities prescribed, otherwise the act was void,[30] and in some states slaves could not be manumitted to the prejudice of existing creditors.[31] The usual judicial proceeding for manumission was on petition by the master to the county court or to a magistrate.[32] In some states the slave could elect to accept or reject the act of manumission,[33] but in other states it was held that no consent by the slave was necessary to the gift of freedom,[34] and no right of election was recognized.[35]

(2) Status and Rights of Manumitted Slaves

While the manumission of a slave by the owner did not confer citizenship, a manumitted slave generally acquired the right to take and to hold property.

The status of manumitted slaves and slaves having the inchoate right of freedom was a condition sui generis regulated by statutes in the several states.[36] Manumission did not confer citizenship or any of its incidents,[37] since the emancipation of a slave was regarded merely as a donation to him of his value.[38] A slave with inchoate right to freedom had the right to own and possess property,[39] and a slave who was emancipated might hold lands.[40] A devise to emancipated slaves by their former master,[41] or a devise in trust for them,[42] was valid, as was also a bequest or devise to a slave to take effect when emancipated,[43] and a bequest of property for the benefit of slaves directed to be removed to a foreign country for the purpose of their manumission was held good as a bequest to charitable uses.[44]

A slave who had acquired the right of freedom at a future time was from that time capable of receiving property by testament or donation, and it was held that the property must be preserved for him and administered by a trustee in order to be delivered in kind when his emancipation should take place.[45] A slave who was emancipated by will and was hired out by the executor was held entitled to the amount of his hire from the date of the death of the testator.[46]

Even after emancipation, the master was bound not only to protect, but also to maintain, an emancipated slave when such slave was no longer able to maintain himself.[47]

b. Emancipation; Abolition of Slavery

In the United States slavery has been abolished by various state and federal laws.

In the United States slavery was abolished and slaves emancipated both by state[48] and federal[49] laws. In some states the emancipation proclamation of 1863 was regarded simply as an advertisement of what would be a sure consequence of conquest; it did not, either in law or fact, emancipate the slaves at that time,[50] and was regarded as a war measure which had no operative effect until carried into execution by force of arms.[51] According to this view, it did not take effect to destroy property in slaves except so far as it was carried into effect, in the various portions of the territory described in it, by the actual suppression of hostility.[52] The act emancipating slaves in the hostile states was constitutional, as the United States and the confederate states were at that time belligerent powers, and by the law of nations a belligerent party is justified in resorting to any measure to strengthen itself or weaken its adversary.[53]

The Thirteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, abolishing slavery, equally forbids Mexican peonage or the Chinese coolie trade, when they amount to slavery or involuntary servitude;[54] and a custom which prevailed among the uncivilized tribes of Indians in Alaska, whereby slaves were bought, sold, and held in servitude against their will, and subjected to ill-treatment at the pleasure of the owner, was held contrary to the Thirteenth Amendment and to the civil rights bill of 1866.[55] The Thirteenth Amendment did not remove all the former disabilities of the slave,[56] and it was mainly for that reason that the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted.[57] When the state as parens patriae in a proper case through its constituted officers or agencies takes under its control an infant, the law authorizing such child to be bound to service under proper restrictions is not a violation of those provisions of the constitutions of the state and of the United States which prohibit slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime after conviction thereof.[58]

In becoming freedmen, slaves became "persons," and were punishable under the criminal law for all offenses committed by them in such personal status;[59] and a freedman of legal age might commence proceedings to enforce in the state courts any existing legal or equitable right, created in his favor while he was a slave, that did not then contravene the policy or violate the laws of the state.[60] After the abolition of slavery, all obligations given as the evidence of contracts relating thereto became null and void,[61] and the emancipation act necessarily annulled the laws under which contracts relating to the ownership of slaves were previously enforced,[62] but the liability of a person to pay the value of slaves wrongfully appropriated was not affected by the fact of the subsequent abolition of slavery.[63]

Statute prohibiting persuasion or inducement to slavery. Under express provisions of a federal statute, it is a criminal offense to entice, persuade, or induce another person to go to a place with intent that such other person be held as a slave.[64]

§ 11. Legitimizing Issue

Statutes have legitimized the issue of slave marriages and have rendered children of such marriages capable of inheriting. The status of legitimacy of a child of a slave marriage fixed by the laws of one jurisdiction follows the person and should be sustained in every state to which he may go.

The amendment to the United States Constitution which abolished slavery did not have the effect of legitimizing the issue of slave marriages,[65] but statutes were enacted legitimizing the recognized offspring of negroes who had cohabited as man and wife[66] The purpose of such statutes is to validate customary slave marriages and to render children of such marriages capable of inheriting,[67] and it has been held that they should be liberally construed in order to carry out the beneficent public policy of the state,[68] although one claiming the benefit of their provisions must bring himself within the terms thereof.[69] Children of slaves who, after their emancipation, failed to recognize or consummate the previous customary marriage, as provided by such statutes, were held to occupy the legal position of bastards.[70]

A statute providing that the presumption of legitimacy can be disputed only by the husband or wife or the descendants of one or both of them has no application to the issue of slave marriages.[71] A statute which provides that the issue of all marriages null in law are legitimate has been held not to apply to the issue of slave marriages,[72] although there is authority to the contrary.[73] A statute with respect to the legitimizing of the offspring of marriages between colored people does not affect the right of an illegitimate child to inherit from another illegitimate child of the same mother.[74] Although the children of a slave marriage are to be regarded as illegitimate, they may, under the operation of general statutes, be capable of inheriting and transmitting an inheritance on the part of their mother in like manner as if they had been legitimate.[75]

It was competent for legislature to enact statute providing that issue of slave marriages and their descendants may inherit or transmit property the same as white persons, in view of fact that statute deals wholly with property and its devolution in the state and is not in derogation of any contract rights, since statute was not intended to disturb vested property rights.—Mostilla v. 58 C.J. p 768 note 2.

Apart from statutes, in some jurisdictions, it has been held that slaves who had had the bona fide intent to assume, with the consent of their masters, the relationship of husband and wife and had carried out such intent by living together as such could by their simple choice evidenced by living together after emancipation obtain for themselves and confer on their children all of the benefits of a marriage lawful in its origin.[76] However, where marriages between free white persons and free people of color are prohibited by statute, such persons cannot, by an attempted marriage and acknowledgment, legitimatize children previously born to them.[77] It has been held that, on the emancipation of the children of a slave as a result of the war of secession, their heritable blood was restored, and they were consequently entitled to inherit the estate of their father, who died a freedman,[78] but the view has been taken that the offspring of slave marriages which terminated before the emancipation of the parties thereto could not inherit.[79]

What law governs. The status of legitimacy of a child of a slave marriage fixed by the laws of one jurisdiction follows the person, and should be sustained in every state to which he may go,[80] although the rule must yield to the policy of the state of adoption as far as inheritance is concerned.[81] A statute legalizing the cohabitation of former slaves and legitimizing their issue has no extraterritorial effect,[82] and operates only on those living within the state.[83] The right of a child of a former slave to inherit is to be determined by the law in force at the time of the death of the ancestor.[84]

In order that the law of a foreign state be recognized as to the legitimacy of the issue of a slave marriage, it must be clear and convincing.[85] The fact that persons to whom the statute does not apply because of their nonresidence at the time as of which it speaks subsequently become residents of the state does not render the statute applicable.[86] A statute providing that the offspring of marriages null in law shall be regarded as legitimate has, however, been held to render legitimate the child of slave parents, although such child was illegitimate in the state of its birth.[87]

Retroactive effect of statutes. Where a statute of the character under consideration applies only to those at the time cohabiting in the relationship of husband and wife, it is necessary that the cohabitation exist at the time of the taking effect of the statute,[88] although, if the persons are then cohabiting, the relationship is recognized from its commencement, and its issue legitimated.[89] However, under statutes validating slave marriages generally and legitimating their issue, it is not necessary that the relationship shall have continued up until the time of the enactment of the statute.[90]

Cohabitation as husband and wife. Under a statute legitimizing the children of slave parents living together in good faith as man and wife at the time of the birth of such children, there must be the similitude in form of a ceremonial of common-law marriage,[91] and the offspring of mere casual cohabitation are not legitimate,[92] although if a slave lived at different times in good faith with different women and while so living children were born of them, all would be legitimized.[93]

Right to dissolve or abandon marriage. Where the relationship between slaves living together as husband and wife is rendered legally effective and binding under statutes of this character, neither party, nor both acting in concert, can by abandonment or other act dissolve the bond of the preexist-

Collateral inheritance. A statute providing that slaves who within the state had lived together as man and wife should be regarded as lawfully married and that the children of such slave marriages should be legitimately entitled to an inheritance in any property of the parents has been construed as not extending any right of inheritance beyond the lineal descendants of parents,[96] and under such construction a woman born in slavery under a slave marriage who with her brother was legitimized by the laws of another state could not inherit from her deceased brother as to property within the state.[97] Some statutes have, however, extended the right to inherit from collateral kindred to legitimate children of parties to a slave marriage which was validated by statute.[98]

The statute extends the right of collateral inheritance to the kindred of any deceased negro, just as under other laws it is given to the kindred of white persons, provided such kindred are of legitimate descent; the statute is so comprehensive that it includes all negroes of legitimate birth who are collateral kindred of a deceased negro.—Wallace v. Berry, supra.

Firstly, there is diminution and then loss of conscious recognition of ordinary stimuli, such as would ordinarily attract our attention, whether these stimuli be derived from the outer world or from within the sleeper's own organism. There is also, as consciousness is becoming blunted, a characteristic and indescribable sense of well-being. Voluntary movements become languid and ultimately cease and the muscles of the limbs relax. Meanwhile there develops double ptosis or drooping of the eyelids, the pupils contract, the respiratory movements become slower and deeper, the pulse is slowed, the cutaneous vessels dilate to a slight extent and the general temperature of the body falls, whilst many processes of metabolism, such as those of digestion and of certain secretions are retarded.

SLIPPERY. Having such smoothness of surface as to cause slipping or sliding; not affording firm footing or secure hold.[32]

When used as descriptive of a person, the word "slippery" has the well-understood meaning[33] that the person to whom it is applied cannot be depended on or trusted, that he is dishonest and is apt to play one false.[34]

SLIPSHOD. The word "slipshod" imports negligence,[35] and is defined as meaning exceedingly careless or slovenly; lacking in exactness or precision.[36]

SLIT. The noun "slit" is defined as meaning a long cut or incision; also, any long, very narrow opening, as a fissure, cleft, a narrow aperture or window, etc.[37] When used in relation to optics it means a narrow opening through which the light is admitted, as to the eye or prisms or a spectroscope.[38]

As a verb "slit" is defined as meaning to cut; to cut lengthwise; to cut into long pieces or strips; to cut or make a long fissure; to rend, to split.[39] It has been distinguished from "bite" see 11 C.J.S. p 351 note 9.

SLIVER. A slender piece, as of wood, cut or rent off lengthwise; a splinter; a sharp edge on a board or a piece of lumber.[40]

Corded textile fibers drawn into a fleecy strand.[41] In the rope-making art, hemp fibers, when combed, lying straight in a pack, parallel with one another and not twisted are called a "sliver,"[42] and a sliver when drawn and spun becomes "yarn."[43]

SLOP. As a noun, a liquid which has been slopped, as on a floor; a wet place; waste and dirty water; liquid refuse, as from a house; and as a verb, to cause to dash over; spill[44]

As a nautical or colloquial term, "slop" means cheap, ready-made clothing,[45] and what is known as the "slop chest" statute, 46 U.S.C.A. § 670, is construed in Seamen § 47, and set-off of "slop chest" purchases in seaman's libel for wages is treated in Seamen § 132.

SLOPE. As a noun, an oblique direction; obliquity; slant; especially, a direction downward[46]

SLOT. A narrow aperture for some object to pass through.[48]

SLOUGH. A term used in the Western States in reference to rivers, meaning a channel diverging from the main channel, and returning into it again at a lower point;[49] an arm of the stream separating islands from the mainland,[50] or which in times of unusual water falls serve as an outlet for waters overflowing from the river;[51] sometimes called "swales."[52]

SLOW. As an adjective, having relatively small velocity; moving but a short distance in a long time, not quick in action.[53] It has been distinguished from "prompt" see 73 C.J.S. p 131 note 55.

As a verb, to make slow or slower; retard the speed or movement of.[54]

SLOWLY. It has been said that the word has a relative meaning,[55] and is a relative term when applied to a moving object, and must be measured according to the ordinary speed of the person or thing in question.[56] It is defined as meaning in a slow manner, as not quickly, fast, rapidly, early, rashly, or readily; tardily.[57]

"Slowly" is an antonym of "quickly" see 74 C.J.S. p 5 note 94, and "rapidly" see 75 C.J.S. p 606 note 4.

SLUDGE. Muddy or pasty refuse of various kinds; refuse, acid, or alkali from the refining of petroleum; slime of ores.[58] The term is used also to designate the plate covering an opening in a boiler for removal of sediment,[59] also, the sediment.[60]

SLUICE. A channel or an opening through which water flows.[63]

In connection with the floating of logs, "sluice" and related terms are treated in Logs and Logging § 1 e.

SLUICEWAY. An artificial channel made to draw off water, either naturally or artificially collected.[64]

In connection with the floating of logs, it is defined in Logs and Logging § 1 e as the opening in a splash dam through which the logs pass.

SLUM. The word "slum" has a well-defined meaning, and is applicable to sections of almost every city or town of proportions.[65] It is usually understood to mean a squalid, dirty street or quarter of a city, town, or village, ordinarily inhabited by the very poor, destitute, or criminal classes,[66] with overcrowding as usually a prevailing characteristic.[67] The word is comparatively recent and is of doubtful origin, and it has been doubtfully connected with a dialectal use of the word "slump" in the sense of a marshy place.[68]

SLUNGSHOT. The word "slungshot" is defined in the C.J.S. title Weapons § 1, also 58 C.J. p 773 note 57–p 774 note 62, as a ball of shot or metal covered with leather, and a band of elastic or leather, attached to such ball, and made so that the SLUSHING. In construction, the process of filling up the interstices of a brick wall accomplished by the pouring in of a very thin mortar, so as to run into the spaces and fill them.[70]

SLUT. The word "slut" is often used as a name of contempt for a woman, and formerly also for a man,[71] and when applied to a woman it may be employed as meaning a careless, lazy woman;[72] an untidy woman;[73] a woman who is uncleanly as regards her person or her house;[74] a slattern;[75] a bold or impudent girl; a hussy; a woman of low or loose character;[76] and, in a lighter sense, a young woman; a jade; a wench.[77]

The term is also defined as meaning an awkward person, animal, or thing,[78] and when applied to animals means a female dog; a bitch.[79]

The word "slut," in its common meaning, has been held not to impute a charge of crime[80] or want of chastity.[81]

It is stated in Libel and Slander § 30 that as a general rule it is not actionable to call a woman a "slut," although it may be if it is intended to impute whoredom.

SLY. Artfully dextrous in doing things secretly; cunning in evading notice or detection; done with or marked by artful secrecy.[82]

SMALL. Generally, the word "small" is a comparative term,[83] denoting things of little size as compared with other things of the same class,[84] and depending for its significance on the circumstances of the particular case under consideration.[85] It is defined as meaning comparatively less than another or than a standard in dimensions or amount; diminutive; little.[86]

SMALLPOX. The term is also applied to a gathering of men.[95]

SMOLDERING. Being in a state of suppressed activity; quiet but not dead.[96]

SMOOTH. A relative term which does not lend itself to precise and exact definition, and the meaning to be given to it must be drawn from the circumstances under which it is used.[97]

As a verb, "smooth" is defined as meaning to make smooth or even on the surface; cause to lie evenly; remove roughness or wrinkles from.[98]

As an adjective, "smooth" is defined as meaning having a surface without projections or irregularities readily perceptible; not rough; continuously even.[99]

SMOTHER. The term "smother" is defined as meaning to stifle;[1] to suffocate;[2] to suffocate by the prevention of breathing;[3] to suffocate by stopping the exterior air passages to the lungs;[4] to deprive of life by suffocation;[5] to kill, murder, etc., by depriving of air.[6] It has been said that to the ordinary person who is without knowledge of medical terminology the word "smother" would mean to deprive of air, to prevent the entrance of air into the lungs by either external or internal stoppage of the air passages.[7]

"Smother" has been held synonymous with "suffocate,"[8] and has been distinguished from "strangle."[9]

SNOOKER. As a game played with balls and cues on a pool table see Gaming § 1 b (3).

SNOW. The aqueous vapor of the atmosphere precipitated in a crystalline form, and falling to the earth in flakes, each flake consisting of a distinct crystal, or more commonly of combinations of separate crystals.[17]

The liability of a landlord for injuries resulting from snow accumulations is discussed in Landlord and Tenant § 417 d; the tenant's liability is treated in § 440 c. For references to the liability of a municipality see the index to the title Municipal Corporations.

For other particular applications and specific uses of the word "snow" consult the Descriptive-Word Index.

SNOWFLAKE. In its common and ordinary sense, a word understood to be descriptive of whiteness, lightness, and purity.[18]

The fundamental rule that a term or mark merely descriptive of the subject to which it is applied cannot be a technical trade-mark or trade-name is stated in the C.J.S. title Trade-Marks, Trade-Names, and Unfair Competition § 33, also 63 C.J. p 346 note 90.

SNUB. A sudden checking, as of a running rope or cable.[19]

SNUFF. As ordinarily understood it is tobacco which has been fermented, powdered, or pulverized, and is primarily intended to be taken by the nose, but may also be taken in the mouth for absorption by the gums without mastication.[20]

Regulations prohibiting the sale of snuff are treated in Health § 28.

SO. While the word "so" may be used as a conjunction or as an interjection,[21] it is more commonly used as an adverb,[22] and as an adverb it is defined as meaning in the same manner;[23] as has been stated; in this or that condition or state; under these circumstances;[24] in this way[25] with reflex reference to something just asserted.[26] This is said to be the ordinary way the word is understood.[27]

"In conducting the test, use is made of a chart with a series of lines of letters of various sizes. The line marked '20' is made up of letters of a size to subtend an angle of 5 per cent. when placed 20 feet from the eye. If the letters on the 20 line can be read by a person at 20 feet, his vision is 20/20 When letters of a smaller size can be read at the same distance, the vision is better than normal. When letters of a larger size are required to be read at the same distance, the vision is below normal"—Livingston v. St. Paul Hydraulic Hoist Co., supra.

"So" is further defined to mean therefore[28] or thereupon[29]

The word "so" is expressive of the idea of logical sequence,[30] and it is understood as being the equivalent of "hence" or "therefore" whenever what follows is an illustration of, or conclusion from, what has gone before.[31] The term may be employed as referring to something previously mentioned in an instrument.[32]

SOAKAGE. The term as used in the laws and regulations relating to withdrawal of liquors from bonded warehouses means the spirits which in course of time in the warehouse have been absorbed by the staves of the barrel containing it.[33]

SOAP. Any compound formed by the union of a fatty acid with a base and used as a detergent;[34] any of the compounds of alkali with oil or fat which are known and used in the arts under that name;[35] the potassium salts of the fatty acids.[36]

The term is not limited in common understanding to solid combinations of fatty solid with a base used as a detergent, but has been broadened to include soaps in liquid form.[37]

SOAPSTONE. See Mines and Minerals § 2 b (8).

SOBER. In its common and usual signification,[38] the word "sober" means moderate in, or abstinent from, the use of intoxicating liquors;[39] temperate in the use of spirituous liquors;[40] not overpowered by spirituous liquors.[41]

The term "sober" is synonymous with "abstemious,"[42] "abstinent,"[43] "temperate,"[44] and "unintoxicated."[45]

Its antonyms are "drunk" and "drunken" see 28 C.J.S. p 539 note 26, "intemperate" see 46 C.J.S. p 1102 note 48, and "intoxicated" see 48 C.J.S. p 121 note 72 50.

Statutes in some jurisdictions require that a juror be "sober," and what constitutes sobriety within the meaning of such statutes is treated in Juries § 134.

SOBERNESS. The state or character of being sober, in any sense of the word; sobriety.[46] It has been said that it is doubtful whether the term is susceptible of any accurate definition for practical purposes, and that it sufficiently defines itself.[47]

SOBRANTE. A Spanish word literally meaning "remainder;"[48] and, in a Mexican land grant, the technical term for surplus.[49]

SOBRE. A Spanish preposition having various significations, the general idea conveyed to the mind being that of something over or above or upon another.[50] It is defined as meaning above; over; at the top; upon;[51] also, near something else, but with a greater elevation and power.[52]

SOBRIETY. The state or quality of being sober.[53] It has been said that the moderate, temperate use of intoxicating liquors is consistent with sobriety.[54]

SOCAGE. A species of tenure, in England, whereby the tenant held certain lands in consideration of certain inferior services of husbandry to be performed by him to the lord of the fee. In its most general and extensive signification, a tenure by any certain and determinate service. In this sense it is by the ancient writers constantly put in opposition to tenure by chivalry or knight-service, where the render was precarious and uncertain.[55]

SOCAGER. A tenant by socage.[56]

SOCAGIUM IDEM EST QUOD SERVITIUM SOCÆ. See 58 C.J. p 782 note 26.

SO-CALLED. Commonly named; thus termed.[57] It implies doubt as to the correctness or propriety of so designating the person or thing.[58]

SOCIAL. The adjective "social" is defined as meaning that is spent, taken, enjoyed, etc., in the company of one's friends or equals; as agreeable social relations.[59]

It has been held synonymous with "fraternal" see 37 C.J S. p 198 note 22, and it has been distinguished from "educational" see 28 C.J.S. p 834 note 97.

N Y—Cirasuolo v Hasenauer, 107 N Y S 2d 357, 64 A D 2d 860

Although, a hearing is not required for the suspension of a deputy sheriff where the suspension is for less than a stated amount of time,[20 5] it has been held that a deputy sheriff who is so suspended is entitled to an administrative review of his suspension in court where the mechanism of departmental review is not available.[20 10]

SHIPPING

In view of the adoption in many jurisdictions of the Uniform Commercial Code, which is applicable to transactions entered into and events occurring after the date it becomes effective in a particular jurisdiction, its provisions should be examined in connection with the use of this title.

New Federal Rules of Evidence, effective in 1975, have been adopted governing generally the proceedings in the courts of the United States and before United States Magistrates; and applicable generally, among other matters, to maritime proceedings and cases. These Rules should be examined in connection with the use of this title.

In such case of dissatisfaction with the offer, the vessel owner may reject the offer, elect to take 75 per cent., and bring suit for the balance deemed just compensation.[57.1] Interest is recoverable on such balance from the date of taking to the date of payment or tender by the defendant;[57.2] and for delay in payment of the 75 per cent award required by statute, unless the fault of the plaintiff is the cause of the delay.[57.3] A statutory duty of the government to return requisitioned vessels in original condition may be replaced by a contract provision, in which case the sole remedy is under the contract.[57.4]

The federal statute, 46 U.S C.A § 815, makes it unlawful for any person, by means of false billing, false classification, false weighing, false report of weight, or by any other unjust or unfair device or means, to obtain transportation by water for property at less than the rates or charges which would otherwise be applicable.[78 5] This provision covers the situation where the carrier was deceived and the situation where the effect of the transaction was that the shipper obtained transportation at less than applicable rates in such a manner that its competitors were unaware of what had transpired.[78 10]
